CHAPTER I

THE tender charm of a Summer Sunday afternoon enwrapped the city.

For six long days, the tall chimneys of the factories had hung the city with gloomy draperies of dark smoke, but the somber streamers disappeared with the last shriek of the whistles.

In the morning, a warm Summer shower rarefied the curtains of smoke, then a lusty breeze tore them to pieces and chased them away.

The pleasant odor of distant fields hesitated in the air and the sky spread over Kispest like a gigantic, blue silk parasol.

A window was open in Nagy János Street. The patient himself had opened it and, as he looked out now, the joy of the street trembled on his wan features.

"I guess I'm cured," he thought with some anxiety.

There was fear in his simple statement and he crawled back into his bed harassed by mixed emotions.

Everything had been suspended during his illness. Everything had been blunted. The importance of all things had become gray. And now slowly, as he recovered, the feeling of responsibility was beginning to reawaken in him.

Until now, he had had only one duty: to get well. But, during his illness, the petty worries had grown to huge proportions. Small cracks had widened into deep chasms. Wells of fresh water had become muddy. And he could do nothing about it. To him everything remained as it had been — he had been gently shielded from everything.

He had come to the capital from a small provincial town in order to exchange his diploma for bread. He had temporarily settled in this suburb of factories because he had thought that, what with cheaper living conditions, he would have more time to wait for an opportunity. He had been hoping to pounce down upon some secure little prey of a white-collar job.

But his sore throat had knocked him off his feet. He could not swallow without pain for weeks. He had tried to force and hurry his convalescence and now, at last, it was merrily approaching on this joyous, beautiful Summer afternoon.

Then, all of a sudden, his illness seemed to appear to him as the last remnant of his receding happiness. It had become, all of a sudden, a blue island in an ocean of worried years. For a few weeks, anxiety and hope had been glistening toward him from the eyes of those around him. He closed his eyes now and recalled that lovely moment, that scene of a few weeks ago, when his wife, with petals of apple-blossom on her blonde hair and happy laughter on her lips, had thrown herself upon his bed, stuttering with overwhelming joy.

"— our little boy shook the tree — the little apple tree — and I stood beneath the tree and all the blossoms fell on me — and our little boy shook the tree — "

He closed his eyes. He saw the merry tremble of the beloved blonde curls, the happy curves of her lips, the vernal clarity of her eyes. He recalled the soft touch of his son's tender little hands on his feverish brow.

Now his illness was departing, and his youth, too. It was drifting away from him together with his illness, and the blue island was about to disappear in the distance.

It was possible that to-morrow, too — it was, indeed, highly probable that to-morrow, too — he would be cared for with the same tender love, would be delighted by the patter of an innocent child. Vernal purity would still hover in the eyes — but there would be reproaches in them also. He was irritatedly waiting for the question to pierce his heart:

"What's going to happen?"

Somewhere he had read or heard that bacilli reproduced at an unheard-of speed. It seemed to him that a responsibility-bacillus had gotten into his blood and the germs now multiplied with astounding rapidity, spreading a frightful fever in his veins. They flowered in him, the herd of bacilli was racing in his blood, the sudden disease infected his fingers. He felt it in his back, it tickled his palms, numbed his knees.

It was already in his bed, hiding in the pillows. It climbed the walls and occupied the little painted flowers on the paper.

The glasses on the washstand breathed reproaches, the air became solid, he could hardly inhale —

"Have you been sleeping?" his wife asked.

"No, I haven't — of course, I haven't," he answered nervously.

Slow, drawn-out conversation commenced.

His wife put her hand on his forehead.

He felt like blurting out:

"You must be thinking that — I've been sick a little too long!"

He suppressed it, but when he spoke there was still malice in his voice:

"It's about time for me to get well."

His wife heaved a sigh:

"My God — that doesn't depend on us — "

He was annoyed. The bacilli itched, irritated and excited him. Here he was now, in the clutches of a new fever, a new disease. A disease more stubborn, deeper, more tormenting. Malevolent. She shouldn't have said that. "Be quiet, dear. Don't worry — " Of course, that's what she should have said: "Don't worry."

"I hope I'll be all right by to-morrow."

Slyly, he watched her words.

He still hoped for them. He pricked up his ears, waiting thirstily: "Don't worry!" But the answer did not come. Neither that nor any other. Cruel silence overwhelmed the room. A ripe boil was about to burst open. He chafed it:

"I think I'll be all right by to-morrow. And then I'll go to town — "

He expected to hear lively protests: "No, you won't, my dear. Not at all. You won't go to-morrow."

"Do you think I'll be well enough by to-morrow to go to town?"

"It's possible, dear, I don't know."

These words threw him into a rage. The new disease, the bacilli tormented him. They drove him on: "Responsibility. . . ."

They were gnawing away at his flesh:

"Well, yes — Now you may go. You are healthy. Go! In your little canoe, down to the sea. Open your little diploma-sail against the storm, against the hurricane. Go — fight against the gigantic ocean of humanity. Go — and try to conquer virgin countries. But, first, reach shore — "

Confused conversation drifted in from the street. As if the men and women basking in the Sunday sunshine were excitedly shouting to each other.

"What's that?"

His wife went to the window. As she stood there, the silhouette of her charming blonde head framed by the window, as she lifted her hand to her eyes — all this hit his heart.

"How cruel I can be — " he thought.

He forgot everything.

"What is it, dear, what is it?" he asked her, driven by curiosity.

"Nothing of importance. The gypsies have come home, with their violins. They say they were not permitted to play. They complain that they won't earn anything to-day. Apparently they got into a fight, that's why they can't play."

"Ask them."

"It's no use, they'll lie to you. They say the Crown Prince was murdered — that's why they can't play — "

"What do you mean — the Crown Prince was murdered? Where was he murdered?"

"Oh, it's just talk. They're afraid of their women because they haven't brought home any money."

But the gypsies gathered excitedly in Nagy János Street. They shouted, explained, cursed, complained. This street was Gypsy Lane in Kispest and the crowds grew minute by minute. More and more musicians returned from town. He could see, from his bed, the neck of a bass viol or two, he could hear deep, sonorous voices:

"Well, it's on account of the mourning. They say we can't play for a week."

He swallowed and felt no pain. He felt something quite different. As if the pain had been extinguished by an exhilarating serum. The fatigue of his long days in bed yelled out in him.

"Give me my clothes, dear."

"You can't get up. My God, you can't get up yet!"

He repeated it in a dry and determined voice:

"I'll go to town. Let me have my clothes."

CHAPTER II

HE listened intently to the people in the street car. Factory workers, laborers, women with aprons, tailors' assistants, apprentices, milliners, factory girls, modistes, railroad workers.

"The blouse will have a low neck and the skirt will be pleated. Uncle Charles gave me a yard of narrow silk ribbon but I'm afraid it won't be enough — "

"He isn't a back! I tell you, he isn't a back! Why, that fellow doesn't know how to play football, he has got two left feet — "

"I can't understand how they could steal it! I can't understand it. When I paid for my beer it was still in my pocket — "

"I told the gardener not to force it. I know it can't be done. I remember very well, it never grows in the first year. He said I should just leave it to him, he'd already tried it in Szabadka. So I left it to him and, of course, nothing's come of it."

"Well, who would have believed it! I placed my bet in February, but I did it just out of fun. The horse was first last year and first the year before last. I thought, it might win again. I asked the bookmaker what the odds were on Rascal. Fifteen to one, he said. I took a chance. I'd never have thought that he'd win again; now I got a hundred and fifty. Who would have believed it — three times in succession!"

He was disappointed. No one said anything about the great event.

But — why was it a great event? Why should it be a great event? What had he expected of it, anyway? What had he hoped for? Had he thought that, just because the Crown Prince had been murdered, he would get a job sooner?

He remembered: once he had had a lottery-ticket and when he had looked up the winning numbers in the newspapers he had found that he had not won. He had read the list of the winning numbers twice over — with the ticket in his hand — in vain. Suddenly, his eyes had been caught by the sensational description of an earthquake. He had begun to read it. He had read of the horrified flight of the populace, of the heroism of the troops, of collapsing cathedrals and derailed trains. The story had shaken him. And he had forgotten all about the lottery. It had been so insignificant, compared to the earthquake. In fact, he had not thought of it since. Instead of a prize, he had been given an earthquake — and it had never occurred to him that he had been cheated.

"I need a job, I need bread — and my head is full with the Crown Prince."

"Extra! Extra!"

He trembled in all his body. He bought a paper and avidly began to read it. Yes, the gypsies had told the truth. Every single page of this extra edition contained something about the murder. It had happened barely a few hours before, yet the long columns were already filled with it. It was shouted on the streets.

He got off the street car and entered the first café. He sat down and surrendered himself to the great event.

Sarajevo — Princip — revolver —

But how could they do it so quickly? How could they write millions of tiny letters in so short a time?

At every table, people were rustling newspapers. Everybody was reading. Bareheaded men were running on the street, yelling:

"Paper! Hey, paper! Give me one, too!"

Then the pages rustled less actively and a man at one of the billiard tables turned to his partner:

"Let's continue the game."

Then the pages rustled more and more listlessly and a lady at a neighboring table put her paper down:

"Well, as I said, Aunt Irma didn't like the thing at all — "

A yell rent the air:

"Dark brown with whipped cream, table two, center!"

The proprietor took off his pince-nez and hurried to the little fountain.

"No, my dear child, you shouldn't do that." He was addressing a little girl and his voice choked with suppressed anger. "Other good little girls want to look at the goldfish also."

He would have liked to rise, to explain it to them, to shake them:

"Ladies and gentlemen, this is not an everyday event! Ladies and gentlemen, the murder of a Crown Prince is history — it'll be taught in schools, it will be an examination subject, and the boy who will not know it will flunk!"

"Hey, waiter, do you call this lukewarm? Why, it burns my mouth! Hey, chief! Boss! Please come here for a second. I just want to ask you what do you call hot if you consider this lukewarm?"

The proprietor left the fountain and hurried to the nervous patron. He told the waiter to bring some cold milk and assured the nervous gentleman that this waiter was not a regular man. Just an extra. As a rule, he never hires such careless people, but — Sunday — and Summer, and my God — such things do happen — But what do you say, sir, to this murder in Sarajevo; of course, I always said, the anarchists —

"What do I care? I am not interested in that. Five o'clock in the afternoon on a Sunday there's but one thing in the world that interests me, a cup of lukewarm coffee with two slices of coffee-cake, one slice yellow, the other one brown. I'll read all about it to-night, in my bed, but I don't want to be bothered now. I am bothered enough all week."

"But it hurts our business. We can't have music, for instance. This is one of the features of my place, music from nine o'clock on. If I can't have music, I may as well shut up. Do you think it'll have serious consequences?"

"What do you mean, serious consequences? The only serious consequence that I can see is scorching-hot coffee.— It's very regrettable, but on a Sunday afternoon, when I want to have a cup of coffee — "

" Do you think they'll let the gypsies play to-morrow?"

"How should I know? If the Police Commissioner wants to flatter the higher-ups, the prohibition may last for a couple of weeks."

"A couple of weeks! You mean to say, a couple of weeks? My God, that's all I need! Business is bad in Summer, anyway, and now this prohibition — I'll go bankrupt, I won't survive it."

At every table the great event was slowly being brought into contact with their everyday life.

"You want to go down to Bihar? Business-trip? Why, of course! You don't think that the trains will stop because of the murder, do you?"

"I'll have to change it a little bit. I'll print a sort of black passepartout all around it and add to the caption: 'who were shamefully murdered by criminals in Sarajevo.' "

Rashly and superficially, as they had been accustomed to treat and to discuss every event, they were now bringing the event into relation to themselves. But this was not what he had expected. He had thought that public opinion would explode like a bomb, he had thought that they would, all of a sudden, unbend — Yes — but, what had he meant by "unbending"? How had he thought that they would do it? What sort of expression was it anyway? It seemed to him he was still feverish.

He rose and slowly left the café. And the overcrowded street car was soon racing with him toward Kispest.

He squatted, dejected and disappointed, in a corner of the car. Something had gone wrong. Something had failed. Something had not come off. Something had "frozen" — yes, that was it, that was the word that characterized his excursion. He felt a slight irritation in his throat. That, too! He had been cheated. Cheated, how? Who had cheated him? Had he imagined that the cruel fate of the Crown Prince and his wife would solve his problems? Why had he connected his own fate with that of the Prince? He could not understand it.

Next to him, two men were conversing in slow, measured tones:

"I hope there won't be any scandal. I can't understand how it could have happened. Carelessness, that's all. Not to notice a mistake like that — "

They were carefully examining the extra edition, pointing out passages with a pencil:

"Here — and here — here, too — Well, it's too late now — "

He also took the newspaper out of his pocket and tried to find out what the scandal was.

"The sad demise of the old Emperor — " he read.

And again:

"Franz Ferdinand, Emperor and King, has resolved — "

He knew something about editorial work and now he discovered not only what the scandal was but also the explanation of the magic rapidity with which the extra editions had been prepared.

The obituary of the old Emperor as well as the glorifying articles of the new Emperor and King had been lying in the editorial offices, set up and all ready to print, for several years. The extra editions were now filled with these articles — slightly changed. Of course, the articles already set up referred to the deceased Emperor and the new King. They had not counted on what actually had happened. After all, nothing happened but that the old Emperor survived the young Crown Prince. And, here and there, the old expressions had not been changed.

And all of them had already been set up for years.

This was the scandal. This was the only scandal in the whole affair.

The world remained where it had been, and just as it had been. It was merely the question of a few typographical errors.

Scandal.

CHAPTER III

HE awoke late the next morning and immediately began to experiment with his throat. And he found, somewhat to his dismay, that there was nothing the matter with it. He was well. He had been cured. Now: what should he do with his health?

They had had no chance to talk over anything about yesterday's excursion, last night. When he had arrived home, his wife was already asleep. He had not liked that, she should have been waiting for him. Although —

But, after all, he had to say something about it, and he began, somewhat timidly and quite ill at ease:

"Well, the gypsies were right — yes, they were — The papers were full of it — There was great excitement in the city — "

His wife looked at him and there was sorrow in her eyes. It seemed like a challenge to him.

"I know, I know," he began a little excitedly. "I know what you want to say: what have we got to do with it? That it is of no interest to us. That a job would be much better."

"I haven't thought of that, really. But why do you get so excited? First of all, you ought to get well. Your throat is still sensitive. I am quite sure of that. You oughtn't to talk so much. It isn't good for your throat. Where's the paper?"

He was a little calmer when he gave her the paper. She looked at it with interest.

"Look!" she exclaimed in a lively voice. "These stories must have been written a long time ago. This one mentions the deceased Emperor. And this one here the new King. How interesting!"

"Have you noticed it?"

"Didn't you see it?"

"No, I didn't. Not until I heard people speak about it in the street car. You have good eyes — "

The fact that his wife noticed the changes so quickly depressed him. He watched her now, how she glanced through the articles, how she folded up the paper, how she calmly put it on the table.

"Have you read it already?"

"I know everything. I don't need to know more. It's a big thing — but — "

But. This "but" meant: What, after all, did you expect of it? Did you think that it would solve our problem? But. How did it occur to you to connect our little life with the Court? With the Court! Was this the reason why you hurried so breathlessly to town yesterday afternoon? Was this the reason for spending twenty fillér for car fare? Did you think that the Court would repay you these expenses?

Your great event! Your decisive event! A few typographical errors. Nothing remained of the great experience but a few typographical errors. It was so remote, so far away —

He felt ashamed of himself. Whom was he accusing? With whom was he arguing? Who hurt him?

"My throat doesn't hurt me any more."

"You ought to go back to bed for a couple of days. It'll do you good."

"I am all right. We'll go to town this afternoon. Will you come along?"

They went to town together. It was a very calm, very tranquil afternoon. Café, double portions of whipped cream on their coffee, gentle gossip.

He went to town every day. Alone. He wanted to settle the question of his job. He visited associations, societies, looked up old friends and colleagues, looked around. He never said he needed a job, he merely remarked quite casually:

"I shouldn't mind accepting a good position as office manager somewhere — "

He read the Gazette, the official organ of the government, every day. The more his hopes shrank, the more diligently he perused the Gazette. And the time came when the Gazette was his only hope.

He let the days pass by him, he was not interested in them.

He wanted nothing but a quiet haven whither he could withdraw with his family, a reliable, dependable station where he could bring his train to a stop.

He was full of hopes. But all he could bring home from his daily ramblings about town were encouraging words. He tried to calm his wife with these encouragements, and himself, too. He was unable to pick up anything else.

The only result of his endless visits was a suggestion carefully couched in a hopeful sentence:

"Tell me, dear — What would you say if I accepted an appointment to a District Court — What do you think?"

"It'd be all right with me, dear."

"But — not here — Not in Budapest."

"Well, then not here — "

"I read to-day in the Gazette that there was something at Puj — Do you know where Puj is?"

"I don't."

"It's somewhere in Transylvania. I am quite certain I could get it."

"Very well. It makes no difference where it is. It'll be very good for us."

Well, then: Puj. He had never heard of this village before. And now it seemed he would have to live his whole life there. It did not matter. He would read old magazines in his garden on quiet Summer afternoons, beneath the pear trees, and, some day, he would buy a hammock. He would suspend it on two pear trees. He already saw his son swinging in it. The boy would enjoy that.

He managed to get a letter of introduction from the deputy of his county to the Subsecretary in the Ministry of Justice, and then spent his days waiting for His Excellency to return to Budapest from Kisvárda. For, quite accidentally, His Excellency was not at home. He was told by the clerk in His Excellency's office that he would return on Saturday. Very well. He would come again on Saturday. But he came every day; he secretly hoped that His Excellency might return earlier. The deputy's letter was always in his pocket — he might need it.

"Extra! Extra!"

He was far less eager to read the extra editions now than he had been a few weeks before. How silly he had been to expect anything of the great event. It had not given him anything, not even as much as that certain earthquake once upon a time. He stuffed the newspaper into his pocket. He would read it at home, in Kispest. In his bed. He remembered the nervous gentleman in the café. "I don't want to be bothered; I want to drink my coffee."

In the café, he sat down at the journalists' table. He loved to listen to literary arguments. He was positively delighted if, once in a while, they talked of old Hungarian poets. Walt Whitman, Wilde, Verlaine — he did not like them. He did not know them. But when one of them so much as mentioned Csokonai, his heart was filled with joy. At such times he was grateful to the newspapermen. He could join their conversation. He remembered the provincial Gymnasium where he had studied, where he had learned to love these poets.

But the newspapermen were talking of quite different things this time. He could not understand one single word of their argument.

The Czar will not tolerate it — What will the Czar not tolerate? — Why are all these things so important? — This is the only possible result of the ultimatum — What ultimatum are they talking about? And why is this ultimatum so important? Policy of encircling — Triple Alliance — Then, the ultimatum again —

It was as if they had been talking in a foreign language. He rose, ill at ease, irritated, and dissatisfied, and went home. He saw, with his mind's eye, the charming little Transylvanian town where he would be an Associate Judge of the District Court, he saw the hammock suspended between two pear trees and he saw himself swinging his son in the hammock.

He forgot all about the newspaper.

He threw himself upon the bed, but then the paper rustled in his wife's hand and he woke up.

"Well, is there anything interesting in it?"

"Haven't you seen it? Something funny must be going on. I can't understand it. They say that if there is no reply to some sort of ultimatum, there will be war. The paper says here that, at this moment, the danger of war is quite out of the question. No, it doesn't even say war, it says: conflict — But here, in another sentence, it speaks of war — "

"Oh, never mind it, dear. Don't be afraid. Of course there will be an answer."

That's interesting: now it is his wife who connects their fate with that of the Court.

"Tell me, dear, has this anything to do with that murder?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

"I haven't been reading the papers lately. Well, nothing serious will happen. And we don't need to bother about the Court. We'll go to Puj, have a nice little house and live happily ever after. What do we care about the Belgrade ambassador? Come, dear, let's go to bed — "

The next day, the Subsecretary did not receive him. On the morning of the third day, he was at last permitted to see His Excellency. He handed him the deputy's letter.

"Your request strikes me as rather peculiar," the Subsecretary burst out nervously. "Don't misunderstand me, but at this moment, when the welfare of the Fatherland is at stake, when life and death — such petty affairs —"

He recovered only when he reached the street. People raced by him, pushing and jostling. They all hurried toward a near-by billboard. A billposter was just posting a placard. Not waiting for the poster to finish his work, they began to read it, avidly, eagerly, impatiently, loudly:

"General mobilization — "

He turned to an elderly gentleman who, it seemed, was also greatly interested in the poster and who seemed to know what it was all about:

"I beg your pardon, sir — If you don't mind — what does it mean, general mobilization?"

CHAPTER IV

THEY moved to Budapest and took a flat in a little side street near Kálvária Square. They learned the argot of the war. They learned that there was a front and there was a hinterland. They were told that the hinterland was just as important as the front. They learned the slogans: Take care of your nerves. Be careful. Remain where you are. Everybody is expected to do his duty.

But he still had no duties whatsoever. He had nothing to do. The matter of the appointment, after the Subsecretary's negative answer, was dropped. The bureaux reduced their personnel. There was nothing to do.

He did not understand the whole thing. So many men were drafted and yet there were no vacancies. All he got was fantastic advice. He was told, in a whisper, that it would be a good thing to get a job as a common laborer in Manfred Weisz's ammunition factory. That was as good as life insurance.

His life? He had not thought of that before. True, he had been served with some sort of notice, he had been ordered to report for a medical examination. But —

He went to the café and joined the newspapermen at their table. He risked a question:

"How long will this war last?"

The newspapermen silently smoked their cigars, blew clouds of smoke in the air and did not answer.

A young man with spectacles turned to him.

"Well, the Thirty Years' War lasted for thirty years," he said, smiling. "The Seven Years' War, somewhat less. — Napoleon's wars — You never can tell — "

That evening, he had a discussion with his wife.

"It's impossible. I can't get anything, neither in public service nor with a private firm. They are all complaining. Every office is as full as if all the unemployed had been sent to Budapest, from the enemy countries, too. I don't know what's going on. They say, everybody is drafted. But no one is missing. I can't understand this."

"We should have remained in the country."

"Do you think it's any better in the country? Look, I should like to tell you something. What if the war lasted for a year?"

"Will that be good for us?"

"It's quite possible that I shall have to go also."

"Why do you bring that up again? Why do you worry? We have enough trouble, anyway."

"But, dear — if you look at history — well, the Thirty Years' War lasted for thirty years, the Seven Years' War —"

"But the Battle of Mohács lasted for only one day! Am I right? And then—"

"That's all right, that's all right — I merely wanted to say that I — too —"

"Don't worry about that, dear. We have plenty of things to worry about."

He deliberately neglected to look for a job. The day of the medical examination was approaching and the war showed no sign of ending. Some people said that peace would be signed by Christmas. But there were many who contended that it might even take a year.

One evening they went to the Eastern Terminal.

Wounded soldiers were arriving: the first casualties. The streets around the railway station were crowded with people and when the first ambulance arrived they showered the Red Cross wagons with flowers. The frenzied mob enthusiastically cheered the soldiers who lay pale and bloodless on their stretchers.

They, too, threw flowers and a few small packages of tobacco, just as they saw others do. Then, satisfied that they had done a good deed, they went home.

Volunteer legions were organized and rousing speeches were delivered on the terraces of the cafés. One day, they were caught by the desire for sacrifice. They went to an office on the second floor of a large building and exchanged their gold engagement rings for iron ones.

They were happy that day. In the evening, they took a walk on the Boulevard.

"Is that you, Neufeld? Look, Neufeld," she said and pointed out a soldier whose arm was in a sling.

They walked a few steps with Neufeld, in the crossfire of the common envy of all the passers-by. Neufeld talked very little but they were both extremely happy to have been permitted to walk with him.

"The Fatherland demands sacrifices," she remarked in a very lively tone, when they got home.

He felt a slight sensation of shame on account of Neufeld. Neufeld's arm was in a sling, people were proud to walk with him, he had no ordinary, everyday worries.

They used words at the supper table that evening which, he had thought, had already lost their meaning. He had thought that a word like "hero" had long been restricted to use in schoolbooks only. Neither of them had ever before spoken, for instance, of going to war.

Now his wife said:

"The janitor's help has gone to war."

It's funny. In a side street near Kálvária Square, on the third floor, where the tenants may beat their rugs only before ten in the morning, where one's next-door neighbors are a cab driver and a coal and wood merchant, one says: Charge. Attack. Heroic defense. We shed our blood. Battlefield. The janitor's help has gone to war.

The battlefield had become a lofty, a sublime conception. Everything connected with this forgotten and gray word had come to life and shone in glory.

One of his friends said to him that it would be a good idea to manufacture underwear for the Army. Indeed, to manufacture anything. A contractor could make a lot of money. Underwear or caps. Or tunics. It would be excellent business.

He looked at him as if he had suggested heresy. How could any one, in this heroic age of steel and blood, be so common, so vulgar?

But he was quite certain that they would not draft him. He had survived three medical examinations: he had never been found fit for military service. Flat feet, they said.

He considered the hunting of jobs a futile thing now. He thought he would get a job as soon as he was through with that medical examination. He was a little nervous, a little impatient; he wanted to have that thing done with.

He was sitting in his café on the eve of his medical examination. Some one hurried in and told them there was a mass meeting in front of the Café Baross. The speakers, he said, glorified the war in glowing terms.

"At so much per day."

"It's quite possible that they are paid for it," some one remarked. "I had an interesting experience to-day. I was riding on a street car and there were three women in the car. Three women in mourning. They began to talk. Near Oktogon Square. One of them was crying. Oh, my God, she sobbed, my poor, dear Kálmán, my Kálmán, I had nobody in the world but him. Says the second woman, Don't cry, the country needs the lives of our beloved. My only son fell in the war and yet I don't cry. Our losses are insignificant when the glory of the country is at stake. You should always think of that. Says the third woman, My husband is also lost, he's been taken prisoner by the Russians. Whereupon the first woman speaks up again, very contemptuously. Don't be so proud of that, my dear.

Only those count who died and who are wounded. All the rest are only slackers. Well, I was so absorbed in their talk that I forgot to get off and suddenly I noticed that we reached the last station. I paid my fare again; I thought I might as well ride back on the same car. Then I saw that the women didn't get off either. They also paid their fares again. They didn't speak for a few minutes, then the first woman again began to cry, Oh, my God, oh, my poor, dear Kálmán. Don't cry, lectured the other one, and they played the whole show all over again, just as they had done it before — "

They listened to the story astonished and looked around: had any one heard it? It might be bad for them to talk about such things. There was an old teacher with them, an old gentleman, who had been drinking his afternoon coffee with them for years. Now he waved their talk away with a disparaging gesture:

"Stuff and nonsense!"

"Why is it nonsense?"

"It's nonsense, sonny, because people don't read the philosophers of the French Revolution any more. If you had read Rousseau you'd know that this is just stuff and nonsense. It's nonsense because it is very stupid and flimsy and it's nonsense because it isn't worth it to have three women on the payroll for the sake of a few people riding on one car. And it's nonsense because they don't need the people who hang around the streets, they need the multitudes. They need hundreds of thousands, they need millions — And it's nonsense because we've learned from Rousseau that might is right and might doesn't need the sentiments of the right honorable street and the opinion of a few loiterers. Right is might and might will use its right to take all of us, all of us, just as we sit here in the café and sip our coffee, and put us where it needs us. Do you think that when there won't be any more volunteers there won't be any soldiers either? Do you think that they will leave the sad ones and the cowards at home just because they are inclined to hang back? If they do not succeed in persuading you when riding on street cars — do you think they will not bother with you any more? Charming, very charming! My, but you are naïve! Sure, sonny, they have nothing to do but pay wages to women in black to ride all day on street cars —"

CHAPTER V

THIS speech put him quite out of humor. It was a shade too brutal, it did not fit his previous experiences. It would have been much better had everything remained as it had been: flowers on Red Cross wagons, men with crutches laden with the fragrant petals of gratitude, singing volunteers, enthusiastic masses, marching soldiers, proudly beating hearts....

...They need multitudes, they need millions, and I can do nothing about it.

Of course, if everybody must go, I will also go, I will be also there. Who wants to shirk his duty? But to be ordered about and not even asked, to be considered a nonentity, not to be able to do anything about it!... Compulsion. Force. Curious.

This incident only introduced him to a bitter series of disappointments and destroyed illusions. His torn enthusiasm was brutally shaken time and again. Tired and suffering, he listened to the silently debating newspapermen:

"There is a statue of Czar Peter the Great, in St. Petersburg: his extended hand points in the direction of Constantinople. That was Czar Peter's last will and testament. A beautiful and heroic gesture, and if they conquer the Dardanelles, the Russian landlords may safely continue their extensive system of land cultivation — "

"I beg your pardon — "

He interrupted them, excited and in despair:

"I beg your pardon — What has our revenge got to do with the Russians' extensive system of land cultivation?"

An evidently well-disposed young man attempted to enlighten him:

"Oh, it has a lot to do. The revenge is of secondary importance now. What counts now is this: the Russian landlords, the big magnates, the men with hundreds of thousands of acres, need waterways to transport their crops cheaply — and the cheapest waterway is the Dardanelles — if it is in their possession."

"Well, and what if we beat the enemy on all fronts, everywhere, except at the Dardanelles?"

"Don't be so naïve! There are other questions also."

"What, for instance! What other questions?"

"Well, how about the colonies? the Eastern markets for German dry goods? the Russian cotton? the coal fields?"

He could not bear it any longer. He rose and went home.

She was still awake. Anxiety was tormenting her fresh young features as she offered her lips for him to kiss.

"Dear — your examination — to-morrow — "

"To-morrow — "

"But you've never been a soldier."

"I haven't. But — "

"But — you have the privilege of being a volunteer — haven't you?"

"I have. Yes. But — what do you think — what does that mean?"

"Well — if you want to go, you go, and if you don't —"

"Oh, no, dear. That means nothing but that I'll be an officer some day — that is to say — I may become an officer." *

* TRANSLATOR'S NOTE: In the late Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, all university and college graduates, also all graduates of Gymnasiums, Real Schools and other secondary schools preparing for universities (a Gymnasium or Real School diploma is commonly regarded as equal to an American A.B. degree), were privileged to serve, in peace time, one year as aspirants for a commission in lieu of the compulsory three years' service for all others. Aspirants were permitted to report (volunteer) for active service, within certain limitations, at their convenience, while all others were obligated to report at the age of 21. These volunteer aspirants, colloquially called volunteers, were detailed, after a preliminary military training, to Reserve Officers' Training Schools, whence they

"And if you don't want to go, will you have to go just the same?"

"Why, certainly. There's a war going on. And then again, the Fatherland demands that everybody do his duty — "

"And the men who have families will not be exempted from service?"

"Of course, not. But, dear, let's not talk about that. If I have to go, I'll go. I'll be there with the rest of them. But we don't need to worry about it now. I was examined three times and they never found me fit for service. My good old flat feet — "

"What's flat feet?"

"That means that I can't march. Soldiers have to march and I can't. I'd only be a drawback to the whole business. Whenever I walk, my feet hurt. It's too sad, but I can't participate in the heroic fight."

"Especially, when you have a family — I'm sure they won't be very severe on you — It's beautiful, I can't deny it, it's very beautiful, but it isn't for men with families. And, then, you have flat feet also. Why, there are so many soldiers whose business is war — what do they call them?"

"Regulars."

"Yes, of course. They ought to be enough. And the young men. They'll surely be enough."

"I hope so. . . ."

It was still dark when his wife woke him up the next morning.

"Why so early? What shall I do so early in the morning?"

"I thought it'd be good for you to get up now. To get graduated as Aspirants or First Class Aspirants, ranks approximately equal to those of Sergeants and First Sergeants. In the late War, these courses usually lasted three months. After a short service at the front, usually lasting from three to six months, aspirants were appointed Cornets, and after six more months, they received commissions as Second Lieutenants. Cornets, however, were regarded as commissioned officers. The highest rank a volunteer could aspire to was that of First Lieutenant.

dressed and go out a bit — to walk a little — If you'd walk a couple of hours — "

"Why should I walk at dawn?"

"You said your feet get swollen if you walk a lot — "

"Well, and? Suppose my feet do get swollen?"

"Then your flat feet will show more. You know, that was the reason they didn't take you before — "

He had exchanged his golden ring for an iron one, he had given flowers and tobacco to wounded soldiers, he had yelled: Long live the war! He had been proud to walk with Neufeld whose arm had been in a sling. The first thing he had looked up in the paper every morning had been the official communiqués. And, well, it couldn't be denied, he had been enthusiastic, he had flung his hat in the air, he had cheered. And now, now he — now he should bring up his flat feet as an excuse?

Yes, yes, he too had used heroic words, he too had said: battlefield. He too had cried: victory. He too had shouted victory, courage, victory, courage — What was this, anyway?

He began to dress. He did not want to tell his wife anything about his thoughts, he did not want to provoke an argument. All right, she was right.

He was dressed. He thought he might go to an all-night café, sit down, have a cup of coffee and wait.

No, he would not go to the café now. First he would take a walk, in the fresh air of the early morning. He had had a cup of coffee at home already, why go to the café? He would, instead, walk for a while.

He walked over to the Western Terminal. Then he turned about and went to the Eastern Terminal. At the Eastern Terminal, he turned once more, walked down Rákoczi Avenue and Kossuth Lajos Street and crossed the Danube to Buda. Then he followed the quay to the Chain Bridge. There he stopped and took a deep breath.

He blushed. What was this? Flat-foot training? To bring out the swelling? To make the pain in his feet visible?

He looked at his watch. It was only six o'clock.

He climbed Fortress Hill, then with a considerable detour, he marched over to Sváb Hill. Now he turned back and, via Margit Bridge and the Boulevard, he marched back to József Boulevard, to the building where the examination took place. He arrived there at nine o'clock, breathing heavily, with a slight pain in his ankles.

As soon as he arrived he was called in.

He stepped to the measuring rod all naked.

A sergeant yelled out his height.

An officer with eyeglasses, most probably an army physician, without even rising from his seat, merely slightly turning his head, from a distance of some eight feet, in a gray, colorless, indifferent voice, as if he were reading it from a sheet of paper, said:

"Fit for service."

He felt very embarrassed: standing there all naked among gentlemen of his kind. But something cut into his flesh: perhaps that conversation of the night before concerning the Dardanelles and the Russian wheat. Or was it the argument with his wife about his privilege to be a volunteer? Something flamed up within him. After all, he had a wife and a small child. If he were alone he wouldn't do it. But he had duties toward his family. It was painful and embarrassing, but he had to do it.

But he was annoyed because he was naked.

He stepped to the surgeon and bowed.

"If you please, doctor — I have flat feet — Look — "

And he lifted his leg.

The surgeon bent nearer. For a second only. He replied almost at once.

"Yes, slightly — You may request to be assigned to the cavalry — Do you want to serve in the cavalry?"

He couldn't answer. What should he answer? "Beautiful Hussar, beautiful Hussar" — he heard the old song ground out by an invisible hand-organ. And when they gave him a piece of paper, he started to slip it into his trousers pocket, only to notice again that he was naked.

So he had become a soldier. "Hadnagy uram, hadnagy uram! Mi bajod van, édes fiam?" he recited to himself the first two lines of the ballad he had learned when ten years old.

It was amazing — how all Strindbergian problems had vanished of a sudden, and the immortal Codex of Emperor Justinian, and the superb logic of the philosophers, and the tormenting problem of next month's rent, and the odds on the Great Autumn Handicap, and the huge library with the bay window he had wanted all his life.

Terrible!

He met his wife on the street, near their home. She had been, with their son, to the market. They began to wave their hands when they noticed him. They laughed. But he, with an ashen-gray determination, dryly hurled it at them:

"I am drafted."

CHAPTER VI

THE little boy begged to be taken in his arms, his wife dropped the basket. Pain twitched her features, she gazed at him with wide-open eyes. Her clean, healthy laughter degenerated into a grimace. She leaned against the wall and stared at him. Tears came into her eyes.

"Did you tell them about your flat feet?" she asked in a wooden voice.

He did not answer. What could he answer? Yes, my dear, I told them about the flat feet but they did not take it into consideration, what do you say to that, what an injustice! Forward, patriots!...

When they reached their flat, she took her purchases to the kitchen. Then she came into the living-room. She sat down, and silently, rigidly, gazed ahead of her. Those big eyes of hers stared into the distance. She kept silent.

The little boy began to sing, in his thin, childish voice, to the beat of marching soldiers:

Piszkáld ki, piszkáld ki,
Piszkáld ki belöle —

She slowly lifted her eyes to him. She rose, went to the child and said to him gently, with sorrow in her voice:

"Don't sing, my son, don't sing now."

She sat down on the sofa, then, all of a sudden, she threw herself upon it and began to sob.

"Look here, my dear — it isn't sure yet — why, the war may be over soon — the papers say that only five per cent die — and those who die of diseases are included in the five per cent. — Don't cry, please — don't cry — After all — in feudalistic times — why don't you listen to me? — well, under the feudal system — it was a prerogative to be a soldier — an extraordinary privilege — the bourgeoisie have only recently — "

He wanted to explain to her how it had been in the days of feudalism and how the bourgeoisie had only recently acquired the privilege of sacrificing their blood. But he mixed it all up, indeed, he was not quite sure of it himself. As a matter of fact, the historic truth made little difference — it did not calm her, this feudalistic business was no good at all. . . .

"And, you see, I don't have to go yet — I have at least three months before — And peace will be signed by Christmas. They only want to insure themselves — "

Yes, that was it. He had not thought of it before. He did not have to go at once. Of course. He decided to find out all about this at once.

He took his hat and went. He expected to come home with good news. He hurried to an acquaintance, a soldier. A lucky fellow, he was, he had been wounded on his hand during the first week. Now he could stay at home until the end of the war. They said that those who had already done their duty once would not be called upon to risk their lives again. He was now serving in a military warehouse and was proudly walking the streets in his uniform. He was held in great esteem. With his sword at his side, he gallantly and jauntily walked the pavements of Budapest.

"I have just been drafted. I'd like to know a few things — a little information — If you'd be so kind — "

"Why, certainly! Of course — Well, don't you be afraid.

Only, take great care to have good, warm socks with you all the time. Take your own along. Always have chocolate on you. You may throw away everything but never your chocolate. Beware of the water — "

"Why the water?"

"Take care what you drink. Always have a little boiled water in your flask. Don't drink from ditches, or from a spring you don't know — "

"Look here, I've never been a soldier. I don't know anything, I haven't the slightest idea how these things go. Are you just simply taken to the front and put in the line? I've never had a military rifle in my hand."

"Of course not. First, they'll drill you. They'll teach you."

"Until I know everything?"

"Until you know everything. But you don't need to be afraid of that. In time of war, those who are clever are trained in six weeks. Incidentally, you have the privilege of being a volunteer, haven't you?"

"Yes, I have. Tell me, what does it mean precisely, this volunteer business?"

"Well, you'll be sent to an officers' training school. You'll become an officer. If you graduate from the training school, you get a commission when you reach the front."

"Are there any examinations?"

"Of course, there are."

"And is it possible to flunk?"

"Why, certainly it is. But don't let the idea of an exam worry you. They don't care so much for formalities nowadays as they used to. You simply beg to be sent to the front as soon as you are trained and, out there, you'll get your commission after your first act of bravery, or after the first attack. And then you are a gentleman. You've a pretty salary. You have an orderly. You don't have to carry the sack. You eat in the officers' mess — "

He did not understand a word of it. Mess, chocolate, orderly —

The tension of expectation had lasted for several months. Now it was over. He did not need a job any more. Subsecretary of Justice, future — all were gone.

The newspapers were full of war bulletins, the show windows with electric signs. Portraits of unknown soldiers glorified by electric bulbs. He went home without any good news, without any unexpected morsel of happiness. What will he say to his wife when he gets home? What?

"Imagine, three battalions have crossed the Stryj — "

Or:

"The contractors who delivered paper-soled shoes are convicted — "

Or:

"Count Tisza declared in the House that the Russian advance in the Carpathians is merely an episode. Even if the Russians reached Szolnok, it would be nothing but an episode — "

What should he tell the crying eyes, what should he present to despair, how should he cure the burning, open, questioning wounds?

From home, from the little village in the Carpathian Mountains, interesting news had come to him. He could not very well tell it to his wife, but he had been pondering over it quite often.

In the council room of Ugocsa County, the governor had tried to calm the excited councilmen, for news of the battle in the Carpathians had already crossed the county borders. The governor had repeated Premier Tisza's words:

"And even if the Russians reached Szolnok, don't worry. In this war of nations it would amount to nothing but an episode — "

Whereupon one of the councilmen quietly remarked:

"Well — if my colt is dead, what does he care for even the greenest of grass?"

Of course. He was drafted. He was a soldier now. He would go to war. He would fight. Chocolate? Future? Boiled water? If my colt is dead —

But his fate was settled at last. He was taken care of. He was insured. He had a program. But what would happen to her? And to the child?

Oh, yes, the government helped the families of those who were drafted. Enthusiasm! They shouted: A soldier's wife — a soldier's son!

He thought of going home to the old folks, to his parents, to talk it over with them. What to do. He heard somewhere that the railroads carried soldiers free of charge. And their families. The State wanted to decrease the population of the capital. He went to the office where they gave out the free railroad tickets. He entered the room proudly, a little haughtily:

"I am going to war. I want free transportation," he said somewhat cockily.

He thought they would be courteous and flattering; he thought they would be infinitely polite; he thought they would hurriedly, obligingly and immediately give him the tickets. "I am going to war."

A number of well dressed young ladies were in the office. Several well dressed, healthy, blooming gentlemen. They were writing, registering, turning pages, issuing orders, talking. He was sent from one desk to another, he filled out long questionnaires. They asked him questions, unpleasant and very personal questions. They asked him why he desired to have free transportation.

"I am going to war," he answered angrily.

"Yes," said a lady, and put it down: "drafted."

As if she had written: double-breasted suit, two buttons.

At last he got a third-class ticket. They gave it to him with a gesture that seemed to mean: "Here, poor man, take it, but that's all, we don't want to see you now for a year — "

Should he entrust his family to these people? Would these take care of his child? These?

He tore up the ticket. He threw it away. Now he knew what to do.

The family would go home to his parents. They would stay with them to the end. Until he came home from the war. Or — well, if he died, it wouldn't make any difference, anyway.

At home he began to broach the subject to her:

"Look here, dear — A few more days and I'll have to go — What will you do? We can't do anything about it — can't change it — I can't help it — "

Why did he stammer? To the point!

"All this is just silly talk — that it will be over by Christmas — or next Spring. You will stay with my parents. You and the boy. As long as I am away — "

They took their furniture to a warehouse in Aggteleki Street which had been advertising in the newspapers for some time: special rates to soldiers. They spent their last night in Budapest in a hotel, their flat was already empty.

They had decided to go home together. He would go to his cadre from there. He borrowed 200 korona on eight per cent and gave the furniture as collateral. He was to pay back the loan only at the end of the war, when redeeming the furniture.

They lived well on the last day. They brought everything they thought the little family would need in a small village. In one of the shops, they offered him a sweater. A nice, warm, knitted sweater. He bought it. He put it on immediately, in the shop.

She was surprised:

"What do you need that for?"

CHAPTER VII

THERE were still a few more days, before joining the colors. This sounded a little cocky to him: joining the colors. And that other expression so frequently used, going to war, seemed snobbish. He used to say: when I go — But his relatives said: Next week, you'll join your regiment. For the time being, they were at home, in his parents' house, in the little Carpathian village. Everybody was proud of him, proud that he was about to join the colors. Except his mother and his wife. Nor did either of them say anything about "joining the colors."

On his last day at home, late in the afternoon, his mother, in a curiously assured voice, called him to her bedroom. How charming it was, this bedroom! How far one could see from its windows! As far as the Vécsey Forest. The sun had not set yet. The field was dotted with small pools of water and they were red. The windows had iron bars. It was possible that he would never see this room again. The bedroom of his parents. The white lace bedspread. The old inlaid chest of drawers.

"Son — "

"Yes, mother — "

"Son, don't worry about anybody but yourself. Your family will be well taken care of — "

"Do you think, mother, that it will be over soon?"

"I don't think so, son. Wars always last long. I remember how long Wallenstein's wars lasted. I remember, when I was a little girl, I heard them shout on the market place, at Nagyvárad: Napoleon taken prisoner — There was always a war. There were always wars. And all lasted long — "

"But what about this, mother — how shall I take care of myself? How can any one watch out for himself on the battlefield?"

His mother's great assurance cooled him off a bit. He deliberately chose the word "battlefield" to hurt her —

His mother continued in a serious and determined tone:

"Son, you know how to watch out for yourself. You will come home. But it is important that you don't worry about your family. Look out for yourself only. I don't worry about you."

Unheard of! Does his mother think that —

"Mother, do you think that I'll be a bad soldier? that I'll be a slacker?"

"No, my son. God forbid! I don't think that you'll be a bad soldier. You will be a good soldier. You were a good son, you are a good father, you will be a good soldier. Whatever you do, you always know where you are. You must go. But you will come home. When the time comes, you will come home, able, healthy. It is your duty. My dear son — dearest — "

Tears were slowly dripping from her eyes. She was crying.

This moved him. He was touched.

"Don't cry, mother dear. You're right. I will come home."

"I don't cry for you, son. I cry for your brother."

Unheard of! This sentence infuriated him.

"But, mother — mother dear — What do you mean? — Why, he isn't even a soldier! — What's the matter with my brother? Why, he is exempt!"

"I know, son — He is exempt now — But for how long? How long?"

That's amazing. He had to go, he had to go to war and his mother cried for his exempted brother.

"Look here, son — Your brother is a stubborn man — He can't adapt himself. He doesn't know how to take care of himself — I don't know what's going to happen to him."

"But he is not a soldier."

"That doesn't mean anything — How long is he going to keep out of it?"

He tried to control himself, but he burst out:

"And I, how shall I take care of myself? How shall I take care of myself on the battlefield? in fire, among enemy bullets? In battle — how shall I take care of myself?"

His mother looked at him, with infinite kindness, and said, very tenderly:

"I don't know, son. But you will know. Your poor brother — "

And she cried again.

Next morning, when the coach drove up, anger had still not wholly left him. We will see. We will see — when the news comes: In the defense of the Fatherland — When the telegram comes. He wished he could be at home when the telegram came, the telegram informing them that their beloved son had been killed defending the Fatherland — His father, too, got in the carriage, he decided to accompany him to the cadre. He knew already that the place where he was to report was called the cadre. He took leave of them and everybody cried. But the memory of the scene the night before dried his tears. Of course, he was going on an excursion only. And he would take care of himself. No, he wouldn't catch a cold. And he would write. Regularly. Of course. He would know how to get about. On the battlefield. On the front. In the line. In attacks. He would adapt himself. Naturally.

They were already on the highway when they met a man walking barefooted in the melting snow. He could hardly drag himself along in the mud of the road.

"He is also going," his father said.

He recognized in the barefooted man the son of his father's old shepherd. He was of the same age. Old Csutor's son.

Old Csutor had been an important figure of his childhood. Csutor had not been his name, only a nickname. When he had been small, old Csutor had often taken him in his lap. He had played for him on his long, peculiarly shaped flute. He had made swings for him, behind the barn. On Sundays he had brought him hazelnuts from the forest.

He stopped the coach.

His father did not like to give a ride to anybody.

But he said nothing now. Although he knew what his son wanted.

"Are you also going to your regiment, János?"

"Yes."

"How many children have you got, János?"

"Five."

"To the Halmi station, eh?"

"Yes."

"Well, come along with us."

Awkward and timid, János climbed into the coach. Before he sat down, he shook the mud off his feet.

"Say, János, how did you think you could get to the train in time on foot?"

"I'd have reached one of them in time."

"Don't you know that you have to report with shoes?"

"Well, if they don't like me the way I am, they'll send me home."

"What did your wife say? your children?"

"They were glad."

Stubborn man. Cynical. He was not even grateful for the ride. He did not know how to adapt himself. Hm. This fellow had no chance —

His father began to tell him something, in a trembling voice. But it was obvious he was thinking of something else. The old man forced himself to appear nonchalant, as if it had been quite natural to him to accompany his son to the train, to the cadre, on his way to the war.

"You know, son, that happened in the days when they used to catch soldiers with rope. And, you know, over there, near Pusztahegy, Avrám Farkas — "

"Father, tell me. Mother says I know how to adapt myself. But I was not very well off in Budapest. Now, how could I have gotten in this situation had I known how to adapt myself? If I had known — "

"Yes, mother says so — She always says so — "

"Am I so irresponsible?"

"I always thought you were a little irresponsible, but mother used to say that you only took it easy. But you know how to — "

"Well, if I am irresponsible — "

"No, no, it's different with you. Mother says — "

"Is it so certain that I will come home?"

His father's, his old father's eyes were suddenly filled with tears. He cried loudly, tormented, in despair. He was bathed in tears, he breathed heavily. He turned his back on his son, leaned against the window of the coach. He suffered.

At last. So the return is not so certain.

"Mother said she was worried for brother."

His father took the handkerchief off his eyes.

"What did mother say?"

"That the war would last a very long time, that my brother might be drafted also, that she was worried for him."

His father was a rational man. He did not believe in miracles, he explained the Bible in terms of natural laws, logical deductions, materialistic arguments. He considered the religious customs the results of economic necessities. He often quoted brilliant passages from Goethe's "Faust" and from Schiller's poems. He considered Heine merely pleasant reading.

Now he had become serious. He very nearly considered it a bad joke. He disapproved of it.

"What do you mean, your brother? He isn't even a soldier. He is exempt. What could happen to your brother?"

This supposition, concerning his younger son, was so much outside of the territory of logic that it sobered him. It made him nervous, rather. It was evident that his wife's transcendental deduction disturbed the old man. Here was his soldier boy, he was going to war: if they were to worry for anybody they ought to worry for him. The other one was exempt. He went on talking. About the official communiqués. He said, it would be over soon. There were definite proofs. Beyond the shadow of a doubt. It simply could not be carried on any longer. One month more. Two at the most. Why, statistics proved that we had not enough food and supplies for more than a year. Nor men.

CHAPTER VIII

HE had been living in a sort of inexplicable chaos for several days. Soldiership had given him the impression of a small-town fair, a mart. He had met scores of acquaintances and all had given him advice. All had pulled him aside, all had whispered, all had let him in on important secrets. All had told him to watch out, to take care, all had mentioned pull, all had known some one who could "fix up" things. He could not understand them at all. His head was full of war bulletins, electric signs, memories of the capital. Hold out to the final victory. Our brave soldiers. Silver medal for bravery in action, second class.

Bloody sacrifices. Gold, for iron. He had expected a swift current of heroism to carry him along, he had expected the phraseology of the newspapers, the sentimentality of the schoolbooks, to come to life. Instead, he had been benevolently reminded that a heart-to-heart talk with the sergeant major would be very advantageous, he might get better clothing. Also, that it would be a good idea to see the regimental surgeon and talk with him. That the captain was a good man. He could not comprehend why it was so important that the captain was a good man. What did it mean anyway, "The captain is a good man"?

He would be drilled and then sent to the front. He could not imagine that it could possibly happen differently. He had one day more as a civilian, but the whole regiment was already his friend, everybody interfered in his affairs. Everybody talked about something else. No one ever mentioned that there was a war going on, that they needed his enthusiasm, his self-sacrifice, his devotion. Instead, the surgeon would give him a day's leave any time he asked for it, there would be no drill for him that day. What did that mean? Why should the surgeon give him a day's leave? What did one day matter? And what of all the drills in the world? War, battle, bullet. The Fatherland is in danger. Who cared for one day? What should he do with one day? Wife, child and everything — what could he do in one day? The sergeant major would give him good clothing. Why should he give him anything better? Whatever he gets will be all right. He must fight — not dress. Who cares for such things these days? Then: the captain was a good man. Of course, he was a good man. He must be a good man. He would fight with them, suffer hardships with them, share their fate, risk death. Most probably he was a good man and he would give them a thorough training. He was informed that if he asked for it he would be permitted to live in a hotel and not in the barracks. And that he could also get permission to eat outside. These things he regarded as ridiculous.

These men remained what they had been: peddlers. Even those who had been different degenerated to their level. Tens of thousands groaned with pain in the Carpathians, tens of thousands were drowned in the marshes of Volhynia — and he was to ask permission for extra food. And extra room.

The day before he put on his uniform he sent his father home. The old man cried and embraced him several times. Yes, this was different. This was human. This leave-taking, this crying, this lamentation. These befitted the great days, and not the gossip in the cafés. Or the day's leave. And the "talk" with the captain in order to wheedle an easy assignment out of him, on the ground that he was a university graduate.

He did not go anywhere and next morning, in the fort, when he joined the recruits standing in line for clothing, the sergeant dealing out the uniforms looked at him in amazement. He did not even give him clothes. Instead, he pulled him aside and told him in a low tone:

"Wait at the end of the line — "

When it was over, the sergeant came up to him and took him to the other end of the fort where several recruits in civilian clothes had already been waiting for him. All of them gave money to the sergeant and, indeed, they received fairly good uniforms, clean, new boots, new underwear. He remembered that the peasant recruits were given patched-up rags, shoes with holes in the soles. He was ashamed of himself that even now, at this hour, he lowered himself to accept such favors. But he did not protest. He paid, like the rest of them, and went with the men with pull to ask permission to live outside, to eat outside.

He considered them base and painful, unworthy of the times and events, these dishonorable subterfuges.

They told him how long some of the men had been at home. That this man was not ill at all, that the other fellow dug himself in so thoroughly at the office that he would never go to the front, no matter how long the war lasted. One managed to get something in the dispensary, another had become a permanent aide, a third one an eternal office-manager, a fourth one settled down as the director of amateur theatrical entertainments, a fifth one simulated some type of cramp, a sixth one had been wounded in battle. This last one was not respected either. In fact, he was the object of more gossip than any of the others. They said his wound had healed a long time ago.

He felt sympathy only for this man.

Well, what if his wound had already healed? He had been out there. He had suffered. He had risked his life. How could they speak in such a disgraceful manner of him? of him who had already stood face to face with Death? He was the only hero among them all. He was the only man who was a man.

Punctual, accurate, an expert. He heard praises such as these. He could not grasp their meaning. What was this: a grocery store? A soldier should be a soldier. Let him be inaccurate, ignorant, careless, as long as he is ready to fight in the front line, to charge without regard to the dangers surrounding him, to attack enthusiastically. His job is to hold his bayonet fast and thrust. Why does he need to be an expert?

One day he met Csutor's son. The son of their old shepherd. One morning another platoon was detailed to his outfit and Csutor's son was in that platoon. He was very glad to see him again but Csutor's son was rather sour.

"You see, we did get together after all. Now we'll go to the front together."

"No, we won't go together."

"No? Do you mean to say I won't go to the front?"

"Not at all. Only, I am sure to go this week."

"And you think I won't be sent out?"

"Of course, you will. But that won't be this week. I won't be sent to officers' training school, I won't get a commission, I've been trained already, there is nothing to postpone my going."

That was true. He considered it an injustice.

He went to drill with Csutor's son only once.

The next day, Csutor's son was detailed to the replacement troops. He got new clothing, new shoes, new underwear.

"The poor boy got those things free of charge, unlike myself. The ranks in replacements get them without any pull. Perhaps, even extra food."

But Csutor's son had been right. One day there came an order that the volunteers should be drilled separately. Then, after a few weeks, there came a new order: they were sent to the non-commissioned officers' training school. Then they were transferred to an officers' training school. Mornings they went to the drill ground, in the afternoon, to class. They were sitting in school benches, they were quizzed, they had to study. He had to work hard. He heard that they were to have examinations. That they might even flunk.

And if he flunked he would not be sent to the front? It was painful to think of that possibility.

He had thought that there would be parades and flying colors. And showers of flowers, and proud marches, and daring and dauntless gestures.

Instead, they were sitting on school benches, listening to lectures. The spirit of classrooms pervaded them. There were some who regularly avoided school. Simulators, who stole away from class and went to the theater instead, who went to the cafés without leave, who made fun of the teacher, a captain. They joked at the expense of a hero with medals on his chest, spread malicious gossip about the captain, the captain with two medals. They said that neither of them was a medal for bravery; one was a decoration commemorating an anniversary, and the other one was given to every regular officer after a certain number of years of service. That was what the impertinent kids said.

One evening he was sent to guard duty. Hall guard, or something like that. At night, as he stood guard in the hall, in the great silence he took the rifle off his shoulder and, with fixed bayonet, he stared, tremblingly watchful, at the door of the classroom. Thus he stood, at night, with a rifle in his hand. He clenched the butt in his fists — yes, this was it — It refreshed him, it animated him, this two hours' service with arms. At last. He had never felt thus before. Yes, he had. On the day when his civilian worries had ceased of a sudden, as if by magic. That had been genuine salvation. Then, all at once, he had soared above pettiness. Then Fate had lifted from his shoulders the cross of gray troubles. It had given him a feeling of great relief. Now he was again in a mess of incomprehensible things, in a mess of inexplicable things. Classroom lessons, cramming, studies, lectures. Out there, Big Berthas bellowed and Hussars charged at Limanowa — And here he had to recite lessons. He had to prepare home work and they gave him marks. It was possible to flunk a quiz. I flunked the geography quiz in the tenth month of the World War, at the age of thirty-two. Thus he would answer his grandchildren when they would ask him about the war.

And there were inspections, too, just as in the Gymnasium. There came a colonel one day. The District Superintendent of Schools. Edouard, Ritter von Szieber. In uniform. He called on him, too.

"Behavior before the enemy?"

That was the question. Yes, how does one behave before the enemy?

No. He had never heard about that. He had not been in class when the teacher spoke of it. He became bitter. He flew into a rage. He could not imagine what his answer was supposed to be. On the battlefield? — In the distance, a small forest — Russian soldiers are coming toward him from behind a bush — he is now before the enemy — his heart is beating fast, his muscles are taut — Behavior before the enemy —

"I shoot at him, I kill him — "

The colonel frowned. The captain-teacher was angry. He got an "F." He had no chance to improve his mark. He flunked in the presence of the District Superintendent. He was already on his bench when he heard some one fluently reciting:

"— whoever throws away his arms and ammunition before the enemy —"

What was that? Did he have to learn that from books? to throw away arms and ammunition before the enemy? — Hang the scoundrel, put him before a firing squad — This volunteer also guessed wrong. The next one, at last, knew it. He said: the offender shall be quartered in sight of the troops.

And those who did not know this would not be qualified to defend their country? Apparently they would not.

CHAPTER IX

At last, school came to an end. He was even appointed to the grade of corporal. There was only one more field practice to be endured. He was neither among the first nor among the last. He had had a very bad mark in topography, but his official letters saved him. They found that the letters most in conformity with Army Regulations throughout the entire course had been his. Blood flowed freely around Verdun and mountains of flour soaked in gasoline burned all over Europe, cities were consumed by fire and bayonets played hide-and-seek in the throats of clerks, farmers' skulls were pierced by steel splinters, there were three children lost in the evacuation of a village and one of them was trampled to death by a horse. Machine guns mowed down endless lines of men, small nails were dropped from airplanes and they went straight through shepherds—but his official letters were the most correct of all and they had saved him. He had become an aspirant and the experts told him that after a few weeks at the front he would be promoted again. He would be appointed to a higher grade, a grade accompanied with cash money and privileges.

But there was one more practice still to go through with. He was informed that its outcome would have no effect on the marks. He could not possibly make his marks worse. It would be merely a sort of show. They were to show what they had learned. But they were to work wholeheartedly, they were to make the show a success.

The practice was scheduled to begin early, at dawn. The night before, he was sitting in his café. They told him there that a relative of his had arrived in the afternoon and had been looking for him all over the town. The relative had left a message for him, he had asked him to wait, under any circumstance. When he came, he embraced him nervously; he was visibly upset. He had no idea what the relative wanted. The relative began to explain to him that what he was doing was the most foolish thing on earth. That he deliberately sought disaster. Why didn't he think of himself? of his family? Why didn't he try to save himself somehow? He owed this to his family, his parents, his future.

"But what can I do?"

He ought to talk to the surgeon. The relative had already seen him. They would take him out of the replacement troops, would keep him here for a while, would discover that he was suffering from some sort of disease — He would gain time.

"You can't do that without money — I don't know how one goes about it — I don't know — "

He said this very hesitantly, he could not feel the responsibility.

"Of course, you need money. It was stupid of you not to ask some from home, but I'll give you enough. I'll get it back from the family. You'll write and tell them to pay it back to me."

"Well, and all I have to do is to give it to the surgeon?"

"Yes, I've told you, he knows all about it. I've seen him already. Just hand it over to him, quite calmly. It's unheard of, this negligence—You have got to go immediately."

The relative gave him a big, blue banknote of high denomination and urged him to go at once, to act immediately, before it was too late. It was silly, not to do anything. It was lucky that he had heard of it in the last minute. It was possible that, in another week, he would be already on his way to the front. Let's go, let's go. The two of them started out toward the surgeon's house.

So he did it, after all.

Here he was now, stealing through side-alleys, trying to cheat, to deceive, at a time when sales-clerks were stabbed with bayonets and the frozen feet of cobblers broke off from blackened legs like rotting branches, when light signals blinked between sentinels and janitors groaned with pain. With a big blue banknote in his pocket, he was stealing through dark streets now — in the very shadow of the bastions whence four centuries before, Katica Dobó and the women of Eger showered scorching-hot tar upon the heads of the charging Turks.

His mother had been right. And he had thought she had insulted him! The relative dropped in, handed over a blue banknote and he forthwith proceeded to adapt himself. He knew how to go about it. Had his mother expected this of him? Had she known him so well? It was a mistake — a great mistake — He would stop this, this whole organization, this machine, conceived for no other purpose than to degrade him. For no other purpose than to bring about his moral death. Poor mother. Mother, dear, you don't know me, no, you don't —

He turned to the relative and asked him to wait for a second.

He entered a cigar store and asked for a package of cheap cigarettes. He paid with the big blue banknote. They smiled. It was too big, they couldn't change it. You'll pay for it to-morrow, Mr. Aspirant. Oh, no, no. I don't want to carry it around all night. Give me a receipt for it and I'll leave it here until to-morrow morning. Well, we may do that for you.

He left the store, with a cheap cigarette in his mouth, happy, merry, contented, light-hearted. He wished he could wave a greeting to the tall, dark bastion, but such nonsense was out of the question. He could not be so foolish in the presence of his relative.

They were stealing through dark side streets but he was no longer depressed. It was just a pleasant walk in the night and he was slyly watching the anxious and obliging relative. He would get back his big blue banknote tomorrow.

Dear mother — how little you know me — How little! Well, what do you say now? My dear, my only mother, aren't you worried for me now? Do you still think that you don't have to worry for me? I have no blue banknote with me. I can't bribe the doctor now!

The relative stopped and whispered something. This is the surgeon's house. Go in and ring the bell. An orderly will come out. Tell him your name, he will let you in. The rest is easy.

It happened precisely that way. The surgeon came out and was visibly surprised when he saw him. He too was surprised. He had already seen the surgeon but only in the barracks. The situation was rather awkward: his disciplined military morals stiffened his legs, forced him into "at attention." No matter how nonchalantly the tunic hung on the surgeon's shoulders there were two golden stars on its collar, denoting his rank — He was timid and clumsy. The surgeon showed him in.

"What can I do for you?" the doctor asked him, coldly, with hardened features.

"Please, sir, my relative told me that he had already talked to you — "

"What relative?"

"Haven't you seen my relative?"

"I don't know your relations, Aspirant."

The surgeon's severe voice sobered him up. He rose. He was standing "at attention." He did not know what sort of joke it was but he wished he could be out of it as soon as possible. If only the matter would not get any more complicated. He stood there stiff and soldierlike.

"I beg your pardon, sir, some one played a joke on me. I am sorry. Please excuse me," he said formally.

The surgeon's features mellowed.

"That's all right, my boy," he said pleasantly. "I don't even ask you who played the joke on you. I'll forget all about it. Don't get excited, Aspirant. It's nothing."

He tumbled out. In the hall, his eyes were caught by an object. What's this?

In the hall, placed against the wall, there was a walking stick. But there was only one such stick in the world. Its handle was a curly-haired Negro of silver. With movable eyes. There was only one such cane. A cane like that. He knew it well. Its owner was the owner of a forest in their neighborhood. His farm was a few miles from his father's. His son had been drafted a short time ago. He had played with this cane twenty years ago, they weren't making canes like that nowadays. How did it get here? He picked it up. Tried it. The silver Negro's eyes winked at him in a friendly way. Of course. This was the stick. It had the well-known initials. Of course, that was it. Why, certainly. It belonged to the owner of the forest. And his son had just been drafted. He was now in the room with the surgeon.

He turned back and knocked on the door. The surgeon stuck his head out, rather nervously.

"What do you want now, Aspirant?"

"If you please, doctor — I have something important to tell you — Just for a second — "

The surgeon anxiously watched his words.

"Doctor, a boy I know, from my town, has just been drafted. I don't know what's going to happen to him, but his father's stick is here in the hall. I'll watch the boy, I'll watch what's going to happen to him. And you shouldn't have left the stick in the hall — "

The surgeon's face turned gray. He rushed out, brought in the cane and gave it to an invisible person in another room. Then he turned to him, and, staring at him, silently asked him:

"What do you want of me?"

"I don't want anything. Have you seen my relative?"

"I have — "

"Have you promised him — "

"I have —"

"And — now — ?"

"Now — He didn't tell me that you were an aspirant.—

But, please — whenever you want a day's leave — when you don't want to go to drill — "

"And the boy in there?"

"He's a private. Who cares for him? And he has a huge rupture — I wish you'd see his rupture — Believe me — really — please, look at it — it's frightful — believe me — "

He turned his back on the surgeon and left him.

"Can't be done," he said to the relative. "I'll give back your money at the cigar store. It's right there. The surgeon said you hadn't told him that I was an aspirant. That I had gone to officers' school. Can't be done. Impossible."

Lucky that he hadn't had the blue banknote with him. It had been beautiful, the way it had happened. Not even a chance to — It had not been a failure; he had prevented the possibility of a failure in advance. He could not blame himself now.

Was this what his mother had meant? that he always knew what to do? that his instinct would always tell him how to proceed? Had it been wise, in this particular instance, to renounce all possibilities of success in advance? Or had it been merely luck? Had it been the instinct of a weakling or the sentimentality of the strong?

The cigar store was still open. He fetched the blue banknote and returned it to the relative.

CHAPTER X

HE felt bright and bursting with vigor on the morning of the field practice. He awoke early. They said it was possible that they might stay on the terrain for the night. He did not care. Only to go somewhere where there was no District Supercolonel of Schools, in uniform and a sword at his side, where there were no quizzes, where rain fell freely and the wind blew without regard for anybody, where the road was equally hard and muddy for all. He hoped this would be the last one. Nothing could possibly come after it. Nothing but the battlefield. He would be a part of the mutual fate of all and — he somehow imagined that the forces had come to be balanced at last. Equal weights were pulling down both scales. Had he been philosophically inclined that morning he might have pondered as to what tiny impulse was necessary to swing the balance out of its equilibrium. The balance of war. Mathematically, a dot, a particle, a speck, is enough to destroy the equipoise of weights in opposite scales. An infinitesimal speck. Perhaps it was he who had been missing so far. Idiotic. What did he think — would he decide the World War? No — No — he would not — But — mathematically, it was correct —

He was dressed by the time the others were only about to get up. He had a full hour left to himself. He decided to answer his wife's latest letter.

Trembling anxiety radiated from her letter. My dearest, my only one, my universe. What shall I write? I am sad. Our only son begins to realize that you do not belong to us now —

He was writing his answer. The whole affair is quite different from the civilians' conception of it — One cannot tell how jolly it is — True, we had to study too much, and were quizzed too often, but that's over now. You were right — they do take into consideration the fact that one has a family — Thus, for instance, there are certain assignments behind the front. They publish a newspaper on the Northern Front and I have been invited to join the staff. I may accept it — if I can't get anything better. The salary is fair but I'll have to read proof — I'd rather go to the newspaper, though, than to the quartermaster's department, although that is more comfortable. But it is nearer to the front. I wish, though, that you'd not mention this to anybody as yet. Do you think that the newspaper is a better proposition?

What should he write? What could he write? If something happened they would telegraph anyway. If something happened — The telegram carrier was still the same little old woman. She would arrive all wet, most probably, soaked to the bone. She would say the forest was flooded, she could hardly get through — She would get a glass of brandy — His father would open the telegram but, first, he would put on his spectacles — He would say: Well — what's the matter with the marmalade now — Then he would open the telegram.

Tears would overrun his eyes.

What's this? Have I gone mad? Drill. Field practice. I have to mail the letter. How can I dream now — the front is so far away — How could I forget myself? No, the letter is no good. I can't — Why not? Let it go.

He marched smartly, chest out, stomach flat, head high, and when the company began to sing, he, too, joined them:

Égnek a gyertyák az oltárokon,
Mégsem jön ide a párom —

Of all the songs, he liked this one most. It always moved him a little. "The candles on the altar are all lighted. But my darling will not come — " Why not? How far away now were Heine, and "Faust," and Tasso, Csokonai, Arany, Lermontov. He laughed, silently and to himself: here he was, a university graduate, the proud owner of a diploma, who, after long literary debates in Budapest cafés, after long discussions, after Longfellow, was now singing, with a haversack on his back, lines which touched him and delighted him and brought tears to his eyes: "But my darling will not come — " It wasn't bad at all.

They marched kilometers, climbed hills, crossed forests. He was not tired. He sang and played with his thoughts. Joy and freedom played soft music in his soul. Yes, man dies when he must — but, until then, he may sing, read Zola, kiss children, grab the rifle, set his cap at a rakish angle, pull the haversack to its place with a shrug of the shoulders.

Good old flatfoot, how are you? What do you say to all this? The doctor was right —

This practice did not count, it was no quiz, one did not need to get excited, it was almost war and tender scents came from the woods —

Halt. A few movements, then a sergeant major loudly instructed them:

"Under the protection of the night, the enemy took our city by storm. They are now mercilessly plundering. We shall now approach the city from the northeast, surprise the enemy and crush them — "

At last.

For a brief second he expected the newspaper stories he had read to come true: he thought that they would swoop down upon the pillaging enemy with a triumphant yell —

But no.

What kind of aspirant am I, anyway?

Commands were given. Some were assigned to the right, some to the left. Some were sent forward, some were left behind. His outfit was to start in five minutes. They looked at maps, compared watches. He did not understand a word of it all. He had not the slightest idea of what was going on.

With five others, he was sent in a northerly direction. They were supposed to reconnoiter the enemy lying behind a hill.

The other half of the school was the enemy. They had departed early in the morning and they were now somewhere beyond the hills. The enemy had white ribbons on their arms.

They marched toward the hill but after they were out of sight they took it easy: just walked and talked. They reached the hill. He was the commander. They rested beneath a tree. There were a few so-called good soldiers among them, men who always knew better. These told him that his commands ordering the rest had not been correct. It was possible. But he did not care. He would be more careful at the front. Fall out. For three minutes.

The argument ceased. They talked about something else.

Suddenly a few shots were fired near by and some one yelled at them:

"Surrender!"

Hm. The enemy had surrounded them. That was uncomfortable. He did not care for the shots, he knew they were only blank cartridges. He too had some of them in his belt.

"We won't surrender! We'll defend ourselves! Forward!"

He clenched his rifle and looked around.

His classmate, Arnótfalvi, looked square in his eyes.

"Please surrender. That's the Regulation — "

Regulation? He did not know that. It was possible.

"What Regulation?"

"The Regulation that the one who charges first wins and the other surrenders. And there are more of us, anyway."

"Is that also a Regulation?"

"Yes, it is."

Then there was nothing to do. He wouldn't do anything like it on the front, but here Regulations were all-important. Arnótfalvi knew them better, he was quite sure of that. Arnótfalvi was first in school, who should know it if not he?

"Well, in that case, we surrender."

The enemy soldiers left the bushes in which they had been hiding and, grinning, surrounded them.

He was very angry. What would happen to them now? Would they take his grade away from him? What if he had to go to school again?

"Well, we surrender."

"We'll take you to Headquarters. To the General Staff."

Extremely uncomfortable. He could not even imagine what consequences the incident would have. It was terrible. But how was it that he had not heard of this before? Oh, but he had — of course — he had —

"Say, Arnótfalvi — we are prisoners now, aren't we?"

"Yes, you are."

"Prisoners of war, aren't we?"

"Yes, prisoners of war."

"Well, then — take them — Boys, you too, give them up."

Regulations clearly prescribed that rifle and equipment should be taken away from the prisoners.

The enemy surrounded him and his men and led them to Headquarters, to the General Staff. It was a beautiful, warm Autumn day and the enemy soldiers were tired. Every one of them carried two rifles and two haversacks instead of only one. They marched.

"I beg to report, captain, the capture of an enemy patrol —"

He cast down his eyes. He was in despair. Rather death! The shame of it! He was awakened by the loud, healthy, merry laughter of his captain.

"Bravo, my son, bravo! That was smart of you! Great! So you let yourself be captured, eh? In order that some one else should carry your rifle? and your haversack? Bravo! Bravo! Excellent! You're a smart soldier —"

He looked around.

The captain was praising him! He assured him that he was a smart soldier.

The entire staff laughed with the captain and looked at him warmly, approvingly. They stepped up to him and shook hands with him. No one cared for Arnótfalvi.

They said an idea like that could save a town.

He was a hero. He was the hero of the day.

CHAPTER XI

HE was assigned to the seventeenth replacement company. That meant that he was going to the front. Scores of his comrades were also assigned to various replacement troops. The accusers, the malicious ones, the gossips were right again. The fellow who staged the concerts and the theatricals was left out. The surgeon's right-hand man, the fellow who helped out in the dispensary, was left out. An aspirant who had a pleasant voice was left out. An aspirant who had previously been assigned to the stock-room, was left out. A first lieutenant who had not been assigned to replacement troops for a year and a half was left out again.

Some of them reported ill. Others wired to Budapest.

Still others hunted for letters of introduction. Several expected special instructions from the War Office. All around him excitement, despair, search for last straws. Some attempted new courses. The ranks were also excited. They also tried new diseases. They also heard of diseases which would keep them at home. They also looked for pull to secure jobs in offices. All frantically sought new positions, new assignments and new commissions at the last minute.

Those who were left out flattered those in the replacements. Come to me, comrade, I'll get a pair of new pants for you. I'll swap boots with you, of course, I will. You may keep the old ones, too, of course, you may keep them.

Of the others, only the more experienced ones were busy. Non-commissioned officers, that sort of men. Sentenced to go, most of them apathetically waited for the day to entrain. The food became better. It was so good that he too ate with the privates. The porridge was cooked with lard and there were large chunks of meat in the soup. Large, soft, fat pieces, or lean ones, depending on one's taste.

He was glad that he could leave all these clerks behind. No, he wouldn't say a word. If everybody quit, if everybody stood aside, if everybody conspired, it would never end. One with nerves simply couldn't stand it. Yes, — living in peace, with one's family, one may be a clerk. But now! The nervous wreck, the man with asthma, the man with gallstones, the man with lumbago, the man with ailing eyes, let them die if they don't know anybody who could help them. The healthy one with pull buried his head deep in his papers and didn't look up when the unfortunate asthmatic was taken to the train. He would not look up from his papers until the end of the war.

Many were taken out of the replacements in the last hour. Telegrams arrived from various Ministries, one was indispensable in a bank, another one was detailed to an agricultural school. One was found to be suffering from an incurable disease.

And there were the clerks. Their number steadily increased. There were so many of them that, in a short time, they would be killing each other. They would start intrigues against each other, they would plot and scheme, they would denounce each other. These, in the offices, prepared for a war more cruel and more merciless than the one that faced those in the replacements.

He had an unpleasant affair on the drill ground. He was file leader and Rozenstein was in his squad. This Rozenstein was a near-sighted, gaunt, awkward watchmaker's assistant. Jeges was squad commander. Direction: the pear tree. They ran toward it in extended order. They lay down, rose, ran again. They lay down again, and ran forward again. Two or three of them at a time. Rozenstein ran by his side. He breathed heavily and stumbled at every other step. They were already way beyond the drill ground, they were already running in the fields. The near-sighted Rozenstein constantly stumbled, the furrows bothered him.

Jeges bawled him out. He said that Rozenstein behaved as a Jew would. He yelled that Rozenstein would be a coward on the front, too. He would always remain in the rear.

"Listen, Jeges," he said, "don't bawl at Rozenstein. I can see how hard he tries. He can hardly breathe, he's so tired. I can see that he does everything he can."

"Shut up," yelled Jeges at him.

He rose at once and went back. Straight to the lieutenant.

"Lieutenant, I beg to report, I can't tolerate that Aspirant Jeges should yell at a man just because he happens to be a Jew. Rozenstein is a sick man and near-sighted to boot, and I can see that he does everything in his power. Jeges told me to shut up — "

He was boiling over, he was enraged, he was quivering with rage. The lieutenant frigidly replied:

"How dare you leave the line without permission? Go back to your place at once. My commands were: in battle array, and your leaving the line amounts to a retreat. As if we were before the enemy and you'd left your post — "

Depressed and dumb, he returned to his post and lay down. They continued the practice and he worked humiliated, embittered.

After practice, the lieutenant called both him and Jeges aside.

"Where have you read, Aspirant Jeges, that Army Regulations discriminate against Jews? Army Regulations clearly forbid all types of discrimination. How dare you set yourself against Army Regulations?"

He spoke to Jeges at length, but he mentioned neither humanitarianism, nor equality, nor humanism. Only Army Regulations. The lieutenant said that Jeges's offense was just as much against Army Regulations as his leaving the line. He said that both were grave offenses. And unless they promised him, there, on the spot, upon their word of honor, never again to set themselves against Army Regulations, he would report the matter to the captain at once. And then they would suffer the consequences —

He was deeply impressed by the lieutenant's speech. He liked the idea that Army Regulations forbade religious prejudices, that both were grave offenses.

They both promised the lieutenant to be careful in the future. He would never again leave the line and Jeges would never again mention the Jews. They would never again forget Army Regulations. Furthermore, continued the lieutenant, future officers should bear no grudges against each other. He asked them to shake hands. They looked squarely into each other's eyes and shook hands. But, said Jeges, watch out, if you get out of the replacements, if you try to be a slacker, the shake doesn't count. He smiled and replied, right in front of the lieutenant, quite in a friendly voice, "Watch out, brother, you're a dirty coward. You dare bawl at the men only at home. If you get out of the replacements, if you don't come with us, you are a bastard."

Jeges then embraced him and said, "Very well, don't be afraid, I'll never do such a thing again, it was a little too much, forgive me."

The outfit fell in line and they went home, singing. Jeges and he talked until they reached the city limits. They opened up their hearts. They discovered that they both loathed the slackers and neither of them could realize what the war was good for. Neither could understand the little tricks of the machine, of the organization, they could not comprehend what sort of war this one was: registrations, figures, inspections, calculations, supervisions, men in offices and bureaux covering reams of white paper with black ink and drawing men away from the fighting line. There were thousands and thousands of posts filled by men with pull, posts for which veritable death-struggles were being waged — to secure this, to secure that —

The lieutenant rode back to them. He said that a runner had come for him, General Szvörcsök was in town, he was commanded to go to the barracks, right away. He asked which of them was the senior aspirant? They found that it was he. He had received his appointment a day before Jeges had. The lieutenant transferred the command of the company to him and warned him to be careful, for it was possible that they would meet the general on their way. He cautioned him to be particularly careful about the salute. It would be best to send a non-com ahead to find out when the general came in sight. He had better be prepared against surprises. Then he rode away.

He took over the company. The honor gave him a feeling of satisfaction.

Jeges tried to give him instructions.

He looked at Jeges and addressed him in a cold, official voice:

"Aspirant Jeges will take over the command of the second platoon — "

Jeges saluted and took his place at the head of the platoon.

He ordered them to stop singing, sent a corporal ahead and told him to report the general's approach at once. The company marched smartly, he walked proudly, and the pavement of Main Street echoed the rhythmic beat of their feet.

The corporal hurried back to him. Excitedly he reported that the general was at the next corner.

Indeed, the red lining of the general's coat was already visible. He lifted his saber high in the air and cautioned his men to watch out, to be careful.

When they reached the general, he gave the command: "Company, attention! Eyes right!"

He fixed his eyes on the general and executed the salute with the saber, precisely as he had seen the officers do it.

The general's face suddenly grew dark. He shook his head disapprovingly.

"Halt. Come here."

He relayed the command to halt to the company and walked up to the general.

"No good, no good! Why did you leave your outfit? Who is in command while you are not there?"

He went back to the company and gave Jeges the command.

"Well, my son," said the general, "now let's see, how did you execute your salute? Give me your saber — "

"I cannot part with my saber, sir — "

"Don't be a fool. Give me your saber. Very well. Now then, you saluted me this way, didn't you?"

The general demonstrated how he had saluted.

"Well, my son, you are not entitled to this salute as yet. You are only an aspirant. You may salute that way when you get your commission. For the time being, however, you don't bring the blade before your face. You just lean it smartly against your shoulder. This way. This is also a very nice salute. Not as beautiful as the other one, but you are not entitled to that privilege. You are not an officer."

The general smiled when he returned his saber. The officers with the general, seeing that their superior smiled, timidly imitated him.

"It'll be different on the front, it'll be different on the front," boiled within him.

CHAPTER XII

THE old man sent his wife and son to him for a few days. As if they had sensed that he would not be there for long.

"It was very wise of you to come. I was about to go home myself. But now I have a chance for an excellent assignment behind the line and I was afraid that if I went home I might miss it. It was a marvelous idea to visit me."

But his assumed light-heartedness had no effect. There was a heavy burden upon his soul and his wife asked no details about the assignment behind the lines.

His wife remained sad, listened to him silently, her eyes were constantly covered with a thin film of tears.

Lively and natural and good-humored and careless — he tried to be all that. He wanted his wife to see him thus. But he did not succeed. His jokes fell flat and she could easily detect that all his words were lies. He spoke clumsily, awkwardly. Anybody could see that he merely acted. But he acted badly. There was no life in his acting. It was as if he had been prompted all the time. Like one who did not know his rôle. Realizing this, he stopped acting. Their boy was playing on the carpeted floor, they sat on the couch and all of a sudden their eyes were covered with tears and both cried. He kissed his wife's hand and said nothing. He said not one more word of the assignment behind the line, of the newspaper of which he would be managing editor. Of the quartermaster's department which would be in a secure shell-proof dugout, way behind the firing line.

He was going to the front, with a revolver and a haversack, with a map and a first-aid pouch, and with a little tin box containing a card with his name and the name of the person to be notified in an emergency.

He was going to the front, to battle, and he would have a bayonet on the muzzle of his rifle and he would meet another man, also with a bayonet on the muzzle of his rifle, and they would thrust toward each other with their bayonets — or, they might shoot at each other. That other man might take aim at him. That other man had also been jobless before the war, his son was also with his parents, somewhere in the Caucasus — It was possible that he would cut the throat of a baker, it was possible that he would shoot out the eyes of a cantor, it was possible that he would run his bayonet through the heart of a professor — They cried and kissed each other and stared at each other with infinite tenderness and infinite sorrow and with love for which they had to suffer.

He took the boy in his lap and did not say a word to him. He merely embraced him and rocked him and they rocked their son together and their heads met above the boy's head.

"You will go home to-morrow — " he said with a mortal pain in his heart.

The woman and the boy went home the next day and they never said another word about what would be and how it would be. The train took her away and took away his son, and when the huge engine started to go it seemed to him it rolled over his heart and flattened it out. His wife soon disappeared from the window but the boy continued to wave his hand for a long time.

The day to entrain arrived.

Noise and leave-taking and flowers and band. The train was decorated with flowers and all the slackers at the cadre came to see them off and it was impossible not to notice a trace of malice in their eyes. As if they had said: After all, we are the wise guys. But otherwise they acted as if they had considered the replacements all heroes and gladly promised to do everything for them. Even things nobody asked for.

Of course, comrade, if you need anything, just write. Why, certainly, we'll send your letters after you, of course, I will, although, it seems, I myself will have to go in a couple of weeks — All claimed their assignments were only temporary, all expected to go in a few weeks. They complained that service in the offices was frightful, a hundred times rather in the trenches, a hundred times rather on the front. That regimental surgeon is so capricious. It is more difficult to stand him than it is a battle. Those concerts and theatricals eat up a man's nerves. Anybody who says that staging a concert isn't any work is mistaken. Who says that those things aren't necessary? The soldiers need entertainment just as badly as they need bread. Even more so. Entertainments keep up their spirit. They forget their sorrows, they forget the home. Entertainments make them soldiers. The concerts are more valuable than the drills. And then the clerks. They too were full of complaints. You are happy. You've escaped the torments. I am just a rag, everybody wipes his dirty boots on me. One simply can't bear this any longer. We are responsible for everything. Why? And if they don't need us, why don't they send us to the front? We'd go gladly. But we'd like to know who could take our places. It's harder work than to be on guard duty. One must be more watchful than before the enemy. On the front, one faces the enemy only in charges — here, all the time.

All the slackers complained.

But they were there, all around them, all busy, active, all issuing orders, all giving advice. All watched each other suspiciously and all labored to appear indispensable. They distributed rations of zwieback. They discovered, in the last minute, that the replacement battalion was twenty-two cans of meat short. One of them reported to the battalion commander that he had packed eight pairs of pants separately, they were of special cloth, officers' pants. He had reserved the last eight pairs for the captain.

To leave all these men behind, to leave them here! He felt more relieved than on the day when the draft had cut short his worries about a job. To escape them was a greater relief than to escape school. This was more, this was better than anything. There was no conceivably adequate compensation for this feeling. Yes, there was. One was to pay for it with blood. And: — no one asked them anything. No one asked them whether they wanted to go. Just as the old teacher had once predicted, in the café.

They cared nothing for enthusiasm. For phrases. You were just simply in it. "They need the multitudes, they need the masses." There was no agitation. No speeches in front of the Café Baross. No crying women on street cars. There were only commands. How right the old teacher had been! Although — it was better to be anywhere else than here. No, not here, only not here, only away from here. Out there, on the bank of a river, beneath the free and infinite sky, there would be no quizzes, no examinations, no official letters, despite the fact that he got a good mark on them. There would be no slackers out there, no pull, no flattery: Captain, I beg to report, I put in the last eight pairs of pants for you, Captain, there are twenty-two extra cans of meat here.

Jeges was also there. He was a young boy, this Aspirant Jeges, and he was now talking to three young girls. The girls were deeply moved. When Jeges noticed him, he took him by the arm and introduced him to the girls.

"We pledged ourselves," he said, "to go together — "

The little girls stared at them with sincere sorrow in their eyes. There were flowers in their hands and they decorated the hilts of their sabers. He talked to them as if they had been his little sisters, and they sobbed as bitterly as if he had been their big brother. They said that Jeges' name was put down in their Bible, they would put down his name also, and they would pray for him, too, every day.

The conversation had a cheerful and comforting effect on him. They were soothing and refreshing, these three little girls, as if they had come from a foreign world. They had far more to do with the World War than the twenty-two cans of meat. The concert-director seemed to be a mere ham actor, a cheap comedian, a clown at a small-town fair, in the presence of these three little girls.

A bugle call was heard. Time to entrain.

"My wife is waiting for me, my son is waiting for me, my mother, my father, my brothers are waiting for me," he smiled.

The bugle call was heard again. It urged them to go. One of the little girls looked at him:

"Allow me to take leave of you for your little son — "

"And I — for your wife — "

"And I — for your mother — "

With their tender, thin little arms, they embraced him and took leave of him, crying, with sweet pain in their hearts, three compassionate little souls, three pure little hearts, three heroic and sincere little soldiers.

The train rolled out and he stood by the window of his compartment and looked back at the pure and innocent little island of three little girls. At the girls who waved their hands to him, who had thrown white flowers on the road that led to the front. A pure little island and around them the filthy waves of the whirlpool of malicious slackers, simulators, malingerers, clerks. They figured and measured and bartered with the food and, perhaps, they even profiteered.

He took Jeges by the arm and so they stood, side by side, their souls free and purified, relieved, gazing back at the terminal that slowly disappeared in the distance —

From the wagons carrying the men a song came to his ears, his favorite song:

Égnek a gyertyák az oltárokon,
Mégsem jön ide a párom —

CHAPTER XIII

HE sent a wire to his sister asking her to come to the station at such and such a time. When they reached Homonna, he looked out. Yes, his sister was there, and his brother-in-law, the whole family. They brought him salami and roast duck, pastries, cakes, a bottle of cognac, cigarettes. They caressed him, petted him. The children sat in his lap. The whole family was enthusiastic. When did you get a letter from mother, they asked, why didn't you write, do write from the front, they said.

He did not like the reception. Very well, very well, it was as it should have been. One went when one had to go, even though no one asked him whether he went gladly or didn't. But this enthusiasm cooled him off.

He wanted to line up the children and their mother and daddy and ask them: "Well, children, tell me, what would you say if daddy were going now instead of me? Eh? How dared you think of the roast duck and the cigarettes? How dared you think, dear sister, of the salami? How did you come to think, dear brother-in-law, of the cognac? What's all this? Shall I take leave of the roast ducks? Shall I take leave of the salami? What's all this racket? What's all this enthusiasm? Why, there is no revenge any more. Do you think, my dears, that we fight to revenge the assassination of the Crown Prince? My dears — have you never heard of the cheap waterways the Russian landowners want? What do you think of the Asiatic markets of the German industrial magnates? And the cognac!"

Well — he just could not shake off the picture that lived vividly in his memory.

He had been quite a small boy then. A gang of bandits who had been robbing and murdering in the Forest of Avas, had finally been captured by the gendarmes. It must have been twenty years ago. The gendarmes had led the bandits through their farm. László Dobgye and his comrades had been chained to each other, and as they had marched with downcast eyes between the lines of gendarmes, their chains had rattled at their every step.

Then his father had stopped the procession and given a bottle of brandy to the bandits. The gendarmes had let them drink it. For the last time, before they were hanged, they had received a little favor from life. Let them drink, people in the village had said, they are done for anyway and they are harmless now. They won't murder anybody any more. Their chains had rattled and the group of men sentenced to death marched off and the townspeople had said his father had been right when he had given them a drink. They all had run home, all had picked up something, all had given something to the bandits. They had run after them on the highway, they had laden them with gifts.

He was going to the front and they made him take leave of food and drinks and —

The bugle called and he boarded the train. They waved their handkerchiefs, he waved his, then, all of a sudden, he turned to Jeges:

"Look, Jeges, your eyes are better than mine. Has any one fainted?"

"No," said Jeges, "no one."

"Then please do me a favor. Wave my handkerchief for me for a while, I think the lieutenant has called me."

Jeges remained at the window, the nice, the decent Jeges, and waved his handkerchief until the next stop. Then he returned to him to his compartment where he was calmly reading the afternoon paper.

Here and there, they noticed an occasional soldier's grave. At first they looked at them deeply moved, later they got accustomed to them.

The train stopped. It was said they had reached the border. Some of the men got off. They picked grass, flowers. Some of them wrapped a bit of earth in their handkerchiefs. They were all moved. He and Jeges were sad but they were not touched at all, and for that they felt secretly ashamed of themselves. They would have liked a nameless pain to cut into their hearts the moment the boundary line disappeared, but they were overwhelmed by quite a different feeling.

"I wish we had a professor of history with us," Jeges remarked in a low tone.

"Why do you need a professor of history?"

"I should like to know — I should like to be assured by some one — that it is a historical necessity for me to kick the bucket — "

"What's that, sonny, do you want to report sorrow?"

"Come, come, this is no time to joke — It isn't that — I know that, for centuries, it was the privilege of the nobility to defend the country — I know that it was the aristocracy who shed their blood once upon a time — And it seems to me that it's the Jeges family's turn now — The trouble is I don't know history — It seems we've always been slackers — and now we have to pay for it — God knows — "

"Well, brother, I don't know — But weren't there any mercenaries among your ancestors? And then — wait a minute — something's occurred to me — why, if you were slaves, you had been defeated in war — It's quite certain that the Jeges family also fought."

"It's possible — But then we were always the losers — Perhaps now — "

"You'll lay the foundations of the Jeges dynasty."

"No, I won't found any Jeges dynasty, I fight for my own skin, and for myself. I am not a mercenary now, if I win I win for myself — "

Jeges shrugged his shoulders.

"I don't know what all this means, I merely guess. But it can't go for love."

"You will get a piece of the conquered territory — say, of the Ukraine — "

Jeges replied with conviction:

"It's possible."

So there were such people! This fellow Jeges had gone crazy. He must have read about the Order of Maria Theresa and decorations and heroic feats of arms, and now he thought that he would get a share of the land he would help to conquer. Although — who knows? It wouldn't be such a foolish thing after all. To purchase, at the price of risking one's life for a few months, the peace, the carelessness and the joy of a lifetime! But how about those down there? the fellows in the freight cars? the privates? Will they get something too? And will they get less than the officers? And what's going to happen to the Russian soldiers? and the French poilus? Will they become slaves? Will that be necessary? Say, brother, will you want that? Would you take them away from their villages, their children, their accordions, their churches with their garlic-shaped roofs, their harvests? Yes?

No — no — why, certainly not —

The train stopped. At last. After three days' journey, they got off the train in the middle of a meadow.

They had a day's rest, then: to the front.

A gently sloping hill rose on the horizon. They pointed in that direction: there was the front. All of a sudden, he lost sight of Jeges. They were both assigned to new outfits, they were in command of new men now. New commanders came, he did not even notice when Jeges left him, he did not know where he had gone, he just did not see him any more.

He had no time to get acquainted with the new company. He was assigned the command of a platoon and they told him they would start in the afternoon. Precisely to the moment, at the scheduled time, he was at the head of his platoon. They started.

He was lost here. He could not make one step without orders. He did not know where the paths in the swamps led to, he did not know to whom to turn, he did not know what was going on a hundred feet from him. His only contact was with those of whom he was in command. And with his immediate superiors. Of them, he knew only one or two. In a foreign land, beneath a foreign sky, in an alien climate, among strangers, amidst unfamiliar circumstances, he felt like a foreign body. A foreign body that was thrown hither and thither. He had completely lost his independence. There were no connections there. No pull. No slackers. One did not know there how to go about things.

It was well thus. Thus it had to be. At last: complete liberation. Mental calmness. Serenity. He would go wherever they sent him. And wherever he went he would do his duty. It was the business of his superiors to think for him now. He was to watch out and to take care of his men only. One could not well expect that they would be enthusiastic, let alone that everybody be equally enthusiastic. But, at least, they were honest here. Decent. They were brothers. Of course, he would go with them — with these — these timid, good-natured — yes, good-natured — very good-natured — yes — he would go with them — He liked them — They were all, all of them, his brothers — and they all, all together, they all took their blood to — If necessary — How good it was to be with them, how very much better than with the concert-director and the son of the forester! How much better — among these irresolute, weak, lost men — men who had not picked a winning lottery ticket — but men whose conscience was clear —

They were approaching the hill and the men became nervous. They picked faults with each other and were easily irritated. Some of them marched without a word. Others hurled vulgar insults at each other, in short, torn, disconnected sentences. In one line, a slap cracked.

He halted the platoon.

"Look here, boys — I won't say: rest — I won't give commands — I won't say that I'll put the bastard in chains — I won't even address you as boys because there are fathers among you — But let's talk as brothers — Do you know that you have no relatives on earth now? I won't say encouraging words to you, I won't yell: forward — But, do you know that you have nobody in the world now? — Your wife's washing dishes now — your son, playing a flute — your father, smoking his pipe — gentlemen are preparing to go to the theater — there are some working in the fields — some adding up figures — some driving cars — some preaching — some going to a wedding tonight — who is our brother now? We are exiled now, deserted, shut out — who is our brother now? Who is our father? Who is our child? Who our wife? Where are they all? Only we exist — and we are alone — It will be our eyes which will run out and drip down our temples — it will be our knees which will be caught by the barbed-wire fences — Why fight each other now? Aren't there enough against us? Do we need to fight against each other? Platoon, attention!"

Silently and moved and sadly and in perfect order, the men marched behind him —

CHAPTER XIV

THEY were approaching the hill and he felt a sort of unpleasant respect, a sort of uncomfortable regard for the front which, behold, had been steadily coming nearer to him. It spread from the Black Sea to the Baltic and now it resembled a calmly sleeping viper. Yet, it was the field of honor, the gigantic, merciless, sincere and cruel arena of true manliness. Thus it had to be approached: free of all earthly mud, penitent and purified, with naked heart, open, ready to be sacrificed —

And this swamp across which led a road roughly paved with boards. This is the Swamp of Rokitno already, of the Volhynian marshland — Beautiful, romantic names — The Masurian lakes in the North — Drive them into them, drive the dogs into them, cried somebody in an editorial — Hindenburg drowned the Russians in them — Who will be the hero of the Swamp of Rokitno?

The puffed-up carcass of a horse was lying in the swamp, above it, crows croaked —

It was one of our own horses. It might have been our own men just as well. Drowning of soldiers should be forbidden. Somebody might write of our own men, drive them into it, drive them into the Swamp of Rokitno, into the marshes of Volhynia —

An order was submitted to him at the foot of the hill. A sergeant would guide him, and his platoon, to his new assignment.

The sergeant saluted, stepped near him and then clapped his hands in surprise.

"How did you ever get here? — Don't you remember me, doctor? My name is Kun — "

He remembered Kun. Clerk of the District Court in his home town, of course he remembered him. But he was his superior now and he was in no mood to make friends. Nor was he inclined to rejoice. Reunion — What did it mean here?

Mr. Kun looked around, perhaps to ascertain that no one watched him from the front, then bent nearer to him and whispered confidentially in his ear:

"I am going to do everything in my power to help you, doctor — "

"Aspirant!"

Kun was put out for a minute:

" — to help you, sir — "

He looked around. In the distance, airplanes were silhouetted against the sky. Small clouds of smoke — shells — dissolved in the air, one of our own horses rotted in the swamp; from afar, the rattle of machine-guns was heard, penetrating the fragrance of the fields — Behind him, soldiers stood in bluish-gray uniforms, ahead of them, the infinite and terrifying mystery of the Front, near by, a tanned fieldworker in shirtsleeves leaned against an abandoned cannon — and now, Mr. Kun —

"Thank you, sergeant — But how can you believe that? How are you going to help me? Will you ask General Linsingen to put me on the left flank? And will you ask the Russians not to shoot at where I stand? No, I don't need you. Thank you — "

Mr. Kun smiled superciliously. Insultingly, unpleasantly, confidentially.

"I am with the staff and — "

"That's enough, sergeant — That's enough — "

He looked at his men. There they were, there they came, silently, worn, lost in thought, tumbling, uncertain, silenced.

"Light your pipes — Light your pipes if you want to — "

Mr. Kun maliciously interrupted him:

"You'd better not light your pipes because the first lieutenant is waiting for us and he can see us from his dugout — "

"Don't light your pipes," he said disgustedly and wearily, "we'll soon be there — "

The first lieutenant wore a white cap. A white Hussars' cap, of lambskin. He had not got accustomed to these exotic outfits as yet. They were against Regulations. And, incidentally, they served as excellent targets. How could any one wear them?

His entrance into the trench failed.

"No good! Do it again!" yelled the first lieutenant when he was about to make his report.

He went back with his whole outfit, about thirty paces, and made his entry again.

The first lieutenant was angry. He was furious.

"What's this? What kind of an outfit is this anyway? What kind of an aspirant are you? Back again!"

They succeeded at the fourth attempt. The first lieutenant, mellowed, listened to his report. Then he said that the first three entries had been abominable. The last one had been fine. Very fine. He was very satisfied. He invited him to supper.

During supper, the first lieutenant asked him:

"Tell me, are you a good soldier?"

He could not control his emotions any longer:

"Lieutenant — do you mind if I am very honest? Will you permit me, lieutenant, to speak unofficially, as it were, just confidentially? Why, I am thirty-two years old, married, the father of a son, a university graduate. I have a diploma and you, lieutenant, you also have some position as a civilian, a profession — "

"Go ahead, Aspirant — I hope — "

"No, I don't want to hurt anybody. You ask me, lieutenant, am I a good soldier or am I not? What do I know? I don't know. Do forgive me, but we aren't on duty now, we are eating our supper now and out there — I couldn't get out of the replacements, to be frank, I didn't even want to, I almost flunked my exams and if it hadn't been for my official letters I would have. Mr. Kun wanted to help me, he said he was with the staff, I refused him, the entry failed three times — I don't know what sort of soldier I am. I am not a soldier, I am no soldier at all. I am a married man, I am the father of a child, I am a university graduate, but I am not a soldier — You may send me anywhere, lieutenant, I will go, I shall faithfully discharge every assignment you give me — I shall be afraid before the enemy, but that's my business and I won't show it. If it's necessary I'll creep forward among barbed-wire barriers; if it's necessary, I'll charge; if you send me, I'll attack, but I am not a soldier, lieutenant, I am not a soldier, forgive me, I don't even know who is a soldier now, who is a good soldier — "

The first lieutenant pondered.

"As a matter of fact, that's what counts. To do your duty. I am a certified accountant at home and French and English correspondent — Welcome, comrade — "

The first lieutenant's dugout was large, comfortable, pleasant. They talked, they became intimate. After supper, the lieutenant loaned him his orderly to accompany him to his dugout. His orderly was an elderly man, he walked after them dejected, weary, tired. Suddenly he stopped the two men.

"Wait a moment."

He straightened himself out and nervously, with beating heart, he lifted himself to the parapet. Carefully he looked out. He stared and stared but could not see anything, although it was not very dark. The lieutenant's orderly asked him:

"What do you want to see, sir?"

"Sh-h — Don't talk so loudly — I am trying to see the enemy lines."

The orderly laughed:

"You can't see them, sir."

"Of course you can."

"No, you can't, sir. There's no front in that direction. We are in reserves now. The front is over there, beyond the hill. That's where the first line is. This here is only the reserves. The front is at least a kilometer from here, you can't see the Russians from here. We are resting now."

"Then what are all these trenches for?"

"Well, we may use them some day — "

So that's it. So that's the reason for the four entries. For the entries according to Regulations. This wasn't the front yet!

His dugout was miserable. A small hole, dug into damp earth. On one side, against the wall, a wide bench of earth. That was his bed. His orderly spread some straw on it and his bed was made. He could lie down. He put his coat beneath him, the haversack under his head and rolled himself up in his blanket. He did not undress. He turned on his left side and tried to sleep. Accidentally, he touched the cool and damp earth. Sleep left him instantaneously — There were people directing concerts now — There were some growing angry because their bid was doubled — There were some profiteering on stocks — There were some who were irritated because their coffee was served too hot — Unheard of, it takes hours to cool off — There were some going to keep dates — There were some reading war bulletins — There were some saying, Thank God, the 256 is taken — The lieutenant was satisfied, the entry had been quite correct on the fourth try — There were some who had been fired to-day, they were unhappy now — There were shopkeepers who had asked their wives this morning to cook paprika fish for supper and the women, beaming, were just bringing in the steaming paprika fish from the kitchen — There were some who, at this very moment, reached to their hearts and cried, fatally wounded: Mother — There were some whose legs were being amputated just then— There was one lying in a damp hole, his hand withdrawing in horror from the cold wall of the ditch, with a worm crawling toward his face —

"Are you sleeping, Peter?"

"I am not, sir, I am not — "

"Couldn't you build a fire somehow?"

"No, sir, I couldn't."

He fell into a light slumber. All of a sudden, gunfire awakened him. Cannon shots. Machine gun. A runner came: Alarm. He was ready in a second. At the head of his platoon. They went out to the foremost line. They were led through switches. All carried full equipment. With enough cartridges — The first line — There was no difference between it and the one he had entered last evening.

Yes, this one was slightly wider. And higher. The parapets were armored.

He was full of activity, energy and excitement. But he also felt a sort of anxious timidity. They did not leave the trenches, they did no fighting in no man's land. He had expected they would. But it seemed to him now that they could not even get out of the trench, not even if they wanted to. Not forward, anyway. A shaft of light fell here and there once in a while and he saw the barbed-wire barriers in front of them. The carefully built barbed-wire barriers. One could not cross that field of barriers at all. Their order was to keep up a steady fire at the enemy. They did not see the enemy. They were firing all night long. Firing at an invisible enemy. He could not stick his head out. He might be shot. He was intrigued by the shrapnel: they were like fireworks. He liked the way they exploded into beautiful clusters of glowing sparks. And the sounds of the rifles, machine guns, cannon and mines were harmoniously blended as if they were conducted by a musician.

Dawn came and the firing ceased. Dawn came and then cautiously he looked at the enemy. The enemy was dug in within a stone's throw. A sergeant who had been here for some time told him that the Russians had advanced a little last night. That was why they made all the noise.

Dawn came and there was a wheat field before his eyes. Barbed wire was hung on stakes among the tender crop. Enchanting fragrances, the smell of Spring, came from the wheat field and a lovely little breeze blew in no man's land. Sparrows jumped hither and thither among the stakes. They descended upon the barbed wire. The sparrows chirped quite nonchalantly on the battlefield. They jumped about carelessly above the mines. They descended upon the machine that — so they said — spat flames and burned soldiers alive. They alighted upon the gas masks which had been all prepared but had not been used. They sat quietly on the rifles left on the parapets.

CHAPTER XV

IT was Spring — the fields were growing green — A children's song: "Lustily chatters the little brook, its crust of ice has disappeared — "

"Sipos and Rozenstein are wounded. Kamincki is dead — "

Sipos and Rozenstein? And Kamincki? He remembered only Rozenstein. Well, Jeges, he hadn't run away, eh? As a matter of fact, even if he had wanted to he couldn't have — but, all the same, he had not. He had never met either Sipos or Kamincki. Sipos had already been taken back. Kamincki was still there. He could take a look at him if he wanted to. This was his last chance to see how Kamincki looked. But how could he have died? He was told the trenches were secure.

He reported Kamincki's death and added that he couldn't understand how it had happened. They had all been protected. They had not been fighting in the open.

He thought he would be held responsible for Kamincki. That he had to explain why Kamincki had died.

Although it didn't matter either way, Kamincki was taken back before he had a chance to make his acquaintance.

They said he had been killed by a shell-splinter. No trench offered protection from those. He realized that, after all, he himself had not been so secure last night. A shell splinter might have hit him, too. And, in that case, they would have covered him with a coat, too. And the captain would have said: I don't know this aspirant. And they would have taken him back.

He returned to his men. He had worked all night long without the slightest sensation of fear, as if he had been attending, and quite conscientiously, too, to a rather important matter of business. Now, all of a sudden, he became nervous and disquieted. So that's it? So I was in it, too? Of course, a shell splinter might have hit me too? Or a bullet. Or a mine. Was this all? Not even a battle? Or was it a battle?

He looked out upon the field — It was Spring —

The smell of verdant fields roused the sleepy and tired men, the farmers — They gazed at the damp wall of the trench with shining eyes — The wheat fields and the bellies of corpses hanging on barbed-wire fences were growing green — Spring —

They remained in the front-line trenches, the others, relieved, went back to rest. His men were put up in a large dugout, he was given a smaller one for himself. It was much more comfortable than the one he had last night. Except for those on guard duty all went to sleep. After last night they did deserve a little sleep.

Birds chirped, the sun shone, he stretched out on the straw.

Kamincki will never again know how good it is to rest. He will never again pull off his boots — He will never again know how pleasant it is to do that — Although, Kamincki has merely gone to sleep —

Kamincki is merely a few minutes ahead of him — In a few minutes he will not feel anything either — Just like Kamincki — But, he will wake up — And Kamincki won't — But, he will have to wade through barbed-wire barriers — Flame-throwers will be brought into action and his hair will catch fire, and his chest will catch fire, and flames will burn his throat and he will be unable to extinguish them — He will cough and the poison gas will suffocate him — He will be caught by the wire and he won't be able to get out —

The brook is lustily chattering and the corpses among the barriers grow green just like the wheat fields —

Kamincki has gone to sleep — Nothing will wake him up — Good for him! — No bullet will go into his eyes —

Some one woke him up. He looked up at him. The man seemed to be a captain. But he was not sure of it. The officer wore unfamiliar insignia on his collar.

The odd-looking captain reassured him, Don't get up, Aspirant. It is true that you are a lawyer? Yes, it is. Why?

Don't be nervous, Aspirant. Don't put yourself out. Mr.

Kun has recommended you. He gave me your address. I want to talk over something with you. The command permitted me to come here. They permitted me to talk this matter over with you.

What matter? The traps full of spikes? The bullets headed for his lungs? The fire that flame-throwers spit at him? The moving machine guns anxious to get his legs? The shell splinters trying to crack his skull? What matter?

The captain told him that an action had been brought against him. He was threatened with trial before court-martial. He had been called to account. He was a captain in the quartermaster's department. He explained this because he saw that he did not know his rank. The captain wanted the matter to be drawn out. He was a lawyer, he ought to know how to do it.

Why should the matter be drawn out?

Well, because there were some alleged discrepancies in the accounts. The action must be delayed until the next attack.

"The next attack? Why, there was an attack last night!"

"Oh, no, that wasn't an attack. Just a little skirmish. What I mean is a real attack. It can't be delayed long, just a few weeks. And if we could draw out the thing for a few weeks, the discrepancies could be explained and I would be saved — "

The captain would be saved in case of a real attack. A serious attack. Because last night's attack wasn't serious. But if a real attack came, a thousand Kaminckis would go and the quartermaster would be saved.

"And what do you want me to do?"

The captain smiled.

He wanted to prepare shrewd and complicated briefs to be sent to the Quartermaster General, briefs they would answer at great length. Then we would answer them again. Just for a couple of weeks.

He knew that much depended on a captain in the quartermaster's department. He disposed of the milk, he dispensed the wine, he distributed supplies to the officers' messes. He could even recommend men for certain assignments. Good assignments and bad assignments. He was a rather important man. And if he accepted the job, if he decided to prepare the briefs, well, he would see to it that he should get a more comfortable assignment, way behind the front line — He would see to it. He wouldn't regret it. Mr. Kun had recommended him very warmly —

Nice Mr. Kun. So he did it. So he did know how to help him. He proved it, here, on the battlefield, before the enemy. He did speak to Linsingen. He did speak to the Russian General Staff — Here's proof of his intervention. He did speak. He is powerful, that Mr. Kun. But what's going to happen to the others? To what others? To the others who slapped each other in the face while marching toward the front line? who cursed each other at a time when they should have been possessed with the sacredness of the moment? who fought among themselves instead of being inspired by the sublimity of the hour? But, of course, they are unknown, no, Mr. Kun knows them — And now — now Kamincki lies covered with his coat and Sipos's right leg is being amputated — There will be a serious attack: men, maddened by the fear of death, will crawl forward against enemy lines, but he will be sitting way behind the lines, smoking a cigar and pricking it with a toothpick in order to make it draw better — Is it possible?

"All right, captain, I'll do it."

"Anyway, the battalion needs a supply officer and you are just the man for the job. We need somebody, anyway. Well, let's say that you'll be in command of the officers' mess. Guess that will be about the best. We need a man for that job, too. You may come out here whenever you want to — but why force it?"

A few hours after his first meeting with Death, he plunged headlong into a big bunch of papers, documents and records. He read carefully and rather interestedly the detailed description of the food-dictator's thefts. The night was quiet. He inspected the sentinels, then hurriedly returned to his dugout and started to work on the brief. He worked diligently. He will show it to them! The Quartermaster General will have to do some fast thinking.

His orderly was snoring. He heard some noise outside his dugout but he continued his work:

"Whereas — "

But the commotion became louder. He rose, went out and saw Sándor Peti lying on a stretcher. He had inspected Sándor Peti, in his lookout, half an hour before. Now Sándor Peti was lying on a stretcher and he looked as if he were sleeping. He turned on his flashlight and asked what had happened.

They turned Sándor Peti's head and now he saw that half of Sándor Peti's face was missing.

On one side, he was still Sándor Peti, but on the other side he had no saucy little black moustache, no eyebrow, no ear, no temple. On the other side, Sándor Peti had nothing but two bloody rows of teeth and, looking at him from that side no one could see that he was File Leader Sándor Peti.

CHAPTER XVI

NO one was held responsible for the death of File Leader Sándor Peti, whose bloody teeth protruded from his torn face which resembled a dentist's advertisement. All he had to do about it was to report it.

"Some day they will report me too," he thought. "The sergeant will make a little circle, or a small cross, next to my name in the list. He will write it in pencil. The first lieutenant will use ink, the brigade staff, a typewriter. And in Budapest, it will be printed. The old woman will carry the telegram across the Vécsey Forest and when some one stops her at Mrs. Deák's tavern and asks her what's the news, she will answer: Oh, nothing at all, I take a telegram over to the village, but, you know, Sepsys' maid, that great, big girl, was found in the barn with a handsome gendarme and now they are going to fire her — "

He put aside the quartermaster's papers and walked over to the officers' messroom. He had not been there as yet and he wanted to get acquainted with the comrades.

There were four little gnomes in the place, four young men with long beards. Why do they wear beards? He had shaved every day, this morning, too. He was told that they were thinking of their leaves. Some day they expect to go on leave and they want to arrive home with martial features. They were not very glad when he came. Their attitude toward him was rather cold. One of them asked him where he would eat. Where you eat, he said quite frankly, but they looked at him somewhat annoyed. At last, one of them spoke up:

"You'll have to talk that over with the major. You are not entitled to eat in the officers' messroom."

He felt insulted. He clicked his heels, bowed, and left the messroom. The tables were already laid in the messroom and the officers of the battalion came running from every direction.

"Funny that I felt so hurt — First, Kamincki, then Peti, and Sipos, too, and shells fell all night long and machine guns barked, and men were using me as a target, on far-away Volhynian fields, on a battlefield, on the edge of the Swamp of Rokitno; my wife, perhaps, will never see me again and I may never see my son grown up — and then I feel insulted because of the grub and write a brief to the Quartermaster General — The Russians had better not attack now, I am in a nasty humor —

In the afternoon, he was told to report at battalion headquarters. The major shook hands with him and told him to take good care of the officers' messroom, there hasn't been anything served there lately but boiled beef and mashed potatoes. See to it that we have something else and not only potatoes. It would be great if you could get hold of some vegetables. It doesn't matter if they are canned. And try to get this brand of wine, I know they have it, don't let yourself be bullied. He hoped that the whole system would change now. He had much faith in the aspirant. He knew that the quartermaster was indebted to the aspirant. Go at him. Don't be sorry for him. The quartermaster has Prague ham hidden. Don't get frightened. A new era dawns. A new world. Until now, we have been at the quartermaster's mercy. Now we'll go at him. Give him no quarter. You behaved very bravely last night, aspirant. I recommended you to be decorated with the Silver Medal for Bravery in Action. Be very careful. Draw up your menus ahead of time, for a full week, preferably. And if you could —

The major's voice trembled:

"If you could get hold of some milk — "

"I certainly will — "

"But not condensed milk. I hate it. Real milk, genuine milk — "

"I will get some, sir. I'll get hold of a cow. There's enough pasture behind the lines."

When next he entered the messroom they did not say a word. They knew already that he had some devilish pull. Now they were no longer annoyed that one more man — and one not even entitled to it — would shorten their rations. They told him he might stay wherever he pleased. The major will give the command of your platoon to some one else, all you'll have to do will be to take good care of the food. He might come and go as he pleased. If he so wished he would not have to go to the front line at all.

A wagon called for him the next afternoon, it took him back some six kilometers. Into the quartermaster's realm. He gave the brief to the captain. He read it immediately and said that it was superb. Excellent work. But it had to be typed. They brought in Mr. Kun.

And at night, while shells burst in the distance and the roar of an occasional gun was heard, he, sitting in a wicker chair and smoking a Memphis cigarette, dictated the brief to Mr. Kun.

He did not go back to the front-line trenches until the fate of the brief was known. Two days later, there came confidential information from the Quartermaster General's headquarters. The brief was very good. He went to the captain and demanded everything he could think of. Milk. A cow, or fresh milk every day. Fine bottled wine. Colored liqueurs. He demanded hazelnuts. He liked hazelnutcakes very much. If you haven't any, order some from Lutsk. There's plenty of hazelnuts in Lutsk. Chocolate. Vanilla. Everything. Canned vegetables. Anything he could think of. He wanted a cook-book. If you haven't any, get one.

He was blackmailing the captain.

He got everything and the captain smiled.

He said he could think of nothing he didn't have. Or couldn't get.

His wagon was laden heavily when he got back to the line. He brought along a menu for a week and the little bearded cornets and all the other bearded officers shook their heads in amazement.

They said all these things had hitherto been stolen from them.

The major took him to his own dugout. Then he pulled a bottle out of his pocket and placed it on the table. He told the major that, hereafter, a bottle like that would stand on his table every morning, a bottle full of milk.

The major immediately uncorked the bottle and poured some in a glass. He drank the fresh milk greedily and then sent for his aide.

While they were waiting for the aide to come, the major walked silently but happily to and fro. The aide arrived, saluted, and the major turned to him:

"The aspirant hasn't got his decoration for his behavior on the 26th as yet. Who knows when it will arrive? We shall recommend him for promotion. That goes quicker — "

He walked out to the front-line trench and visited the men of one of the platoons in their dugout. Some of them slept on straw strewn on the ground, others smoked their pipes. Silence and smoke and the stench of many unbathed bodies. Suffocating silence and suffocating stench. Something burnt and crackled in the hands of one of the soldiers. Small pieces of bacon on a peg. Paper among the pieces of bacon. The soldier lighted the pieces of paper and their flame roasted the bacon. That was what crackled.

He went nearer to the soldier and was surprised to see that it was Csutor's son, János. He knew that he was here somewhere but he did not know where.

"Is that you, János?"

"It's me."

János showed neither surprise nor joy. He did not even look at him.

"You see, János, I am also here."

"Yes," said János, and looked up. Mild approval shone from his eyes now.

"And what are you doing there?"

"Smoking bacon."

"Why do you smoke it?"

"Because it stinks. You can't eat it, it's so stinking. So I smoke it a little. Then you can't smell it so much. All of us do it."

He gave János a can of meat and said that he would look after their food. He asked him whether he wanted to send any message home. He would write if he wanted him to. He would write his wife that he met him.

"Don't write," said János. "My wife knows that I am here."

"That's all right. I'll write home to my folks and ask them to tell your wife that you are in good health. And that I am here too."

János smiled oddly, wryly. He shrugged his shoulders.

"Don't write anything."

He went back to the officers' mess. The tables were being laid for tea. The major was also there. He went to the major.

"If you don't mind, sir, I shall try to improve the food of the ranks, too."

The major frowned.

"Don't be such a hero, my son. Don't take too much upon yourself. You won't be able to attend to anything well. You've done enough already. I am satisfied with you. Don't force matters."

It seemed to him that some of his comrades were dissatisfied. Two of them deliberately avoided him. He asked them whether there was anything the matter.

"Yes," they said.

The colored liqueurs had been distributed and those who had received anisette were angry now.

"But all of them were Bacewsky liqueurs — "

"Yes, the brand was all right but how could you have given anisette to a lieutenant when the cornets got orange? Negligence— "

He promised those who had received anisette that they would be compensated for it.

They trusted him and said that if he would be more careful in the future, everything would be all right.

He managed to get fifty cans out of the quartermaster for János' platoon. He could not get any more. The captain said that it was very difficult to get things for the ranks. When he saw that it was really hard he gave it up. But, for the time being, he was satisfied with himself. He wanted to pat himself on the shoulder. He had done a good deed.

He had a kind heart —

Suddenly he became aware of a nameless something that rose within him and addressed him, mockingly and contemptuously:

Hey, do you expect public acknowledgment of it? Do you think it will be mentioned in the newspapers?

Suddenly he became aware of the fact that he blushed and was ashamed of his whole charitable action. He had merely helped a beggar.

"Take it, my good man.

"But now I don't want to see you for a year — "

CHAPTER XVII

THE quartermaster remarked one day that he was preparing a great surprise for him. A very pleasant surprise. He also said that the expected attack could not very well be delayed much longer and that the matter, thank God, seemed to be settled. He might need, though, one more brief. But not more than one.

The surprise really was a pleasant surprise. There must have come further confidential information from the Quartermaster General's headquarters for the captain called him in and told him, in a very satisfied manner, that the thing had come off very well. He had not wanted to mention the surprise any sooner because he had been afraid he might need him any day but now he was informed that the latest brief was good for at least two months. The surprise was that he would be sent home for a week. The captain had already reported that, under the present circumstances, he could not satisfactorily provide the officers' mess with the desired things and was obliged to send him home for eight or ten days to buy new supplies.

Indeed, the major sent for him soon afterwards. He told him that it was found to be necessary to send him home and warned him to attend to his duties most conscientiously. He would go to Budapest. The necessary papers would be ready for him by to-night and he would leave early the next day.

In an hour, he was full of errands and commissions. Répás wanted his camera and Mitics asked him to take home his inkwell carved out of a shell. His orderly asked him to take home and mail from Budapest his sweater and his heavy winter boots. The major gave him two huge cases and asked him personally to deliver them to his wife. First Lieutenant Fridek invited him to his dugout, the same in which, on the evening of his arrival, he had asked him whether he was a good soldier. First Lieutenant Fridek and his company were again resting. It was the middle of April now, and quite warm, but First Lieutenant Fridek still wore that same jaunty white lambskin Hussars' cap. The first lieutenant cried, he said: My poor, dear, darling little wife, my poor, dear, darling little wife —

"Give her this letter. Take it to her personally. If you cross the Margit Bridge and turn to your left, you'll find our house right away — "

The First Lieutenant cried bitterly:

"I put everything in the letter. But I'll repeat it to you. Tell them to take a good photograph of themselves, and you bring along the picture. She, and my daughter, Jucika. And then, on the day you start back, send for the package. My wife will give you a package. I beg of you, take good care of it. My wife's specialty is goose-liver with dates. She will have in that package such a goose-liver. I'll give you a bite of it — you have never yet tasted anything like it in all your life —"

First Lieutenant Fridek cried. It occurred to him that it was true; he had never yet had goose-liver with dates in all his life.

He was on his way home.

He saw again the soldiers' graves, he saw again the frontier, he saw again the little villages, the green fields, the unsuspicious goats, the cynical cows. Wise shepherd-dogs slept in front of the houses and station-masters saluted the train with appalling obsequity.

His leave of absence contained the route he had to follow. He had to go through Cracow. He was not permitted to make a detour, to go home. He telegraphed to his family to come to Budapest for a few days. They might be together for a few days.

By the time he had attended to his errands his wife and son had arrived. But their great joy was marred by a feeling of constraint. There was something they could not talk about. They had to keep silent about something.

They did not talk about it. About that something. About what was going on out there.

They were both sad and joyous.

They walked about the town. They dropped in at cafés, confiseries. Young actors and actresses had tea at Hauer's. Monocles paraded on Váczi Street. People were sitting on the terrace in front of Hangli's. They chatted, gossiped. Men wore their monocles just as they had worn them before the war. On the Corso, on the Danube quay, they gossiped just as in peace. Their vocabulary was somewhat enlarged, though. They did not say: Jancsi got his diploma. They said: Jancsi caught a cold at the front. Now he is up in the Tátra. Last year, Jancsi had caught a cold on the skating rink. Now he caught a cold at the front. But the Tátra had always been his favorite place to get cured. Gentlemen were waiting for chorus girls at stage-doors. There was a new waiter in the Napoleon-room of the Café New York. And one on the balcony. The old ones had died in the war. They had to be replaced. Charity-workers were busy. People, however, while sipping their coffee, suspected them of petty thefts. But they suspected the voluntary nurses also. They suspected them of trying to catch husbands. Or of things even worse. But the charity-workers and the nurses had the newspapers and magazines on their side, which printed their photos and praised them unreservedly.

As a matter of fact, the papers were terrible. They had incredibly fantastic stories about the front. He picked up a paper and saw an article about a bathing establishment written in such terms that the innocent reader must have thought that soldiers, from the Baltic to the Black Sea, did nothing but bathe and change clothes. It seemed to him that the soldiers cared for nothing but to tell witticisms to newspaper correspondents.

At home, they knew five or six different types of soldiers.

The papers gave the impression that there were soldiers who, after saying something sentimental to the reporters, enthusiastically jumped before the enemy bayonets. These either died or were wounded inside of twenty-four hours. These deaths and injuries were described in the papers as if the victims had ordered them. As if they depended on the soldiers! And they were served in all sorts of sauces to make them more palatable: lice and damp earth and wet clothes. As if a great feeling of brotherliness were swinging them all forward, as if one great idea had kneaded them into one close, immortal, eternal and sublime mass. The forlorn and card-playing, groaning, drinking, impotent, unbalanced, torn, feverish, dying, rotting, hopeful, trembling millions and millions.

He was walking with his wife on Váczi Street. They met a major. He saluted. The major looked at him.

"Where is your saber, Aspirant?" he asked.

Indeed, he had not been wearing his saber lately. He did not need the saber. He was not angry at all. As a matter of fact he, too, was surprised. Yes, where is my saber? Yes, I ought to wear it.

"Are you ill that you have no saber?" continued the major. "Show me your papers."

Passers-by gathered around them.

He did not think of retorting. He did not intend to be impertinent.

The passers-by, to be sure, seemed to be in sympathy with him. They seemed to be on his side. They eyed the major angrily. The major was perfumed, he wore patent-leather shoes, he was elegant. And he urged him to show his papers, in a haughty and supercilious manner. He, on the other hand, wore awkward-looking, big, yellow boots, and there was a little brass plaque on his cap. A little brass plaque with the proud inscription: IV Army Corps. In the excited silence, he spoke up wearily, quietly, hesitantly:

"I don't wear my saber at the front, either, sir — "

The passers-by were electrified. Their eyes shone. Their lips formed encouraging smiles. The silence grew even more tense. He continued more definitely.

"I don't know whether you know it, sir, but we never wear sabers at the front. And I don't believe I have to be afraid of anything in Váczi Street. I believe I am secure here, even without my saber — "

The street cheered. They shouted in glee.

The fear and anxiety of scores of wives, children, fathers, brothers, slackers, drafted ones, shirkers and malingerers all at once thawed. They gave vent to their hidden, veiled emotions.

The major could not even take down his name. Unless he wanted to create a scandal, he had to disappear as soon as possible. He had to disappear or else something might happen. For, in this unexpected newly created atmosphere, queer and new bacilli multiplied rapidly. But he soon disappeared and thus nothing remained but a story which was spread about town gleefully and enthusiastically. Just as enthusiastically as the news that, on the night of the 20th, we had succeeded in repulsing an attack in the Kol-Malin region, suffering only slight losses.

People, it seemed, somehow imagined that there were only a certain number of invalids. That there was a Corpse Corps to which only a certain number of dead ones might be detailed. They must have thought, even, that the man whose face was cut off to-day was permitted and able to pick it up again, glue it on, and ask for a new assignment to-morrow. They must have thought that the dead ones came to life again. Or else they would not have sewed so diligently piles of underwear. They would not have desired so fervently contracts to deliver so and so many pants. Although, of course, some were detailed to sew pants. The girls were detailed to Trysting Corps. Their duty was to smile at soldiers and to shed tears when meeting invalids. Their duty was to be touched. Everybody was expected to do his duty. The man who smoked stinking bacon leaning against a damp wall as well as the one cracking jokes in a café. This unity was amazing. There had never been such a united point of view.

They did not know that every soldier had an individual fate.

His assignment now was to be with his wife for a few days and to buy supplies in the market-halls for the officers' mess. And to attend to commissions.

He did his duty conscientiously.

His mother, of course, had prophesied that he would do everything he would be ordered to do very punctually. Very conscientiously.

On the last day, he called for First Lieutenant Fridek's goose-liver — with dates — and the photograph. And for Répás' camera.

He took leave of his family once more. They did not mention that certain something with one word. His wife's and his son's duty was to wait for him. To be sad and to be tortured. To tremble for him. Who had given them this assignment? It didn't matter. It was their duty, they had to accept it.

They embraced each other on the platform, their hearts were infinitely heavy and infinitely laden with sorrow. He kissed his son for a long time. Then he boarded the train for Cracow.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE train was flying toward Lublin and Polish legionaries were writing picture cards. Lublin had been mentioned quite often in the communiqués, he thought he ought to remember something about it. It had such a nice, antique name. But he could not think of anything in connection with it. The city was visible already, perched atop a distant hill. On the last day, he had received a letter from First Lieutenant Fridek notifying him that his promotion to the grade of First Class Aspirant had arrived. First Lieutenant Fridek affixed the regimental stamp to his letter and informed him that he might sew on his new insignia immediately. And if anything happened he could use this letter as proof that he was not pretending.

His promotion made him glad, it meant a little money. If the war lasted long, he might even save something. But, he, too, carried gladdening things to his comrades on the front. He had delivered the major's cases. He was bringing Répás' camera, he was bringing cans of peas, and preserves, and tender young kohlrabi, and mackerel in oil, Swiss cheese, salami. And yes, photographs for First Lieutenant Fridek, and the goose-liver with dates is also in the package. His orderly was taking care of that, his orderly who traveled in a third-class compartment. He was a decent boy, one could trust him. Schwarzkopf was taking care of the photographs and the goose-liver with dates. He would now pay back to Fridek the joy he had caused him by the promotion. Too bad he could not have visited mother and father, and that they could not have come down to Budapest. They were happy now because they thought he was in a secure position. But he might be detailed to some other outfit in an hour and it was possible that they would never again meet. But why should they detail him to another post? Now, when he had done favors to all of them, when he had improved the food, when —

Schwarzkopf entered his compartment. He was surprisingly and suspiciously ceremonious. He clicked his heels.

"I beg to report, sir, they ate up a package."

"What did they do? What did they eat?"

"They ate up a package you gave me —

"When did they eat it? How did they eat it? Who did it?"

"Last night, while I slept, they opened it and ate up everything in it. Other infantrymen are also on the train and they thought it was my package and they wanted to kid me. They ate up the package we were taking to First Lieutenant Fridek — "

It cut into him.

Fridek was already smacking his lips on the Volhynian battlefield and watching the western horizon. Waiting for him. For him and the goose-liver with dates. What to say now? How to say it? Perhaps it wouldn't be so terrible. He thought he might buy some delicacy in Lutsk in order to pacify Fridek. No, the goose-liver with dates couldn't be replaced —

He tried to encourage himself. Try to be sensible, Aspirant. Doctor, for God's sake, come to your senses! What are you afraid of? There's a war going on, a war! Dentists' advertisements are being buried and the targets shoot back at you. Slender steel-bullets chase our men and shells demolish dugouts built of concrete. The shepherd's son dares not send a message home, he's afraid to tell his parents that he is in good health. The shepherds guard dynamite in the fields. Clusters of fire fall from the skies and legs are torn off together with the boots. Smile, Aspirant. Hatred faces hatred from Ypres to the Black Sea, millions wrestle and cry in agony, and white birchen crosses glisten on soldiers' graves throughout the Ukraine. What do you want of the goose-liver with dates, Aspirant? Why don't you laugh, Aspirant?

At the next station, an Austrian second lieutenant came into his compartment. They struck up a conversation. He told the lieutenant, with a forced smile on his lips, that he was going back to the front, that he was coming from Budapest, that the wife of his company-commander had sent with him a goose-liver with dates and that the soldiers had eaten up the goose-liver with dates. Unpleasantly interesting, eh?

The second lieutenant, somewhat suspiciously, looked at him through his spectacles. He asked whether it had happened at night.

"Yes, at night. Traveling soldiers wanted to play a joke on my orderly who was entrusted with the package and they ate up the goose-liver."

The second lieutenant gravely shook his head and frigidly remarked that he should have been more careful. Such a thing should never have happened. One should always attend most conscientiously to errands coming from superiors. But these youngsters are never careful enough. Such a thing could never happen to him, he solved all problems and took care of all commissions with utmost attention, he would have brought the package into his compartment. In that case, the catastrophe would have been avoided.

He began to explain to the second lieutenant what they were facing. It was possible that the attack had already commenced. That the Russians were already attacking. He told him that his platoon had suffered losses, that he had been recommended for the silver medal, second class, that the Hussar attacks at the beginning of the war were insane things, that the ranks ought to be better provided, that there was a strong possibility of a great battle, that if his regiment should be put to flight they would be unable to retreat in an orderly fashion across the swamps, that the narrow road paved with boards could not possibly accommodate them, that the men would drive each other into the Rokitno marshes, that they would be all lost there because all of them would want to cross the swamp at once, that they wouldn't find enough roads there, that they would fall into the swamp, all of them, and drown there —

Whereupon the second lieutenant remarked that all this did not necessarily mean that the company-commander's package should be neglected, and that such a thing could not be explained. The man ought to be punished, of course, but commanders are always responsible for the acts of their men.

All other thoughts left him. Responsibility for the lost package tortured him from the soles of his feet to his hair-roots. He could not sleep a wink all night long. He did not even look out when morning came, he was not curious when they reached the terminal, he could not even remember the soft and warm cheeks of his son, or his wife's wet eyes, and the thought that he would never again see his father and his mother no longer grieved him. He quivered at the thought of what the first lieutenant would say.

Nonsense. The newspapers said that Brussilov had already commenced his offensive and was concentrating barrage fire upon the barbed-wire fences all along the front-section. He was trying to break through at all costs in the direction of Lutsk, but our heroic and brave troops successfully repulsed the Russian's attempts.

And now to worry over a goose-liver with dates! A grown-up man! Shame on him.

The quartermaster's detachment was packing when he arrived.

Dull but continuous droning was heard from the direction of the front. They said they had to be ready every minute. They said it was "hot" out there, that no one went out unless it was absolutely necessary. They advised him to stay with them.

No, he would not. He left for the front immediately. The nearer he approached it, the louder and sharper the droning became. He could no longer distinguish its components: artillery fire, machine-gun fire, the sound of exploding mines, rifle fire. Drumfire. Indeed, it sounded as if a giant had been beating a colossal kettle-drum. The drumbeat was infinite and fatal, long and breath-taking, steadily growing and terrifyingly quickening.

The men were not in the trenches. Huge cellars were dug deep into the earth (the soldiers called them fox-holes), and all were in them. A dozen feet deep. Whole companies, whole battalions, perhaps the whole front were hiding in these fox-holes. Only a few lookouts were posted in the trenches. They said that they would stay down there while the drumfire kept on and would return to the trenches only when it ceased. The moment the drumfire stopped they would leave the holes. The Russians always stopped the drumfire before an attack.

A queer and horrifying death-house, deep down in the earth. There they were, hiding and thrown together in nervous, anxious expectation. There were some who went down on their knees and prayed, there were some who drank, there were some who, almost choked to death by the immense quantities of nicotine they had consumed, continued to smoke their pipes, their cigars or their cigarettes.

The men tried to remain motionless and immovable. A vain attempt.

From time to time, names were called out. Then these, with collapsing knees, full of the fear of death, but impotently stubborn and cowardly submissive, tumbled out of the fox-holes, driven by a blind Fate.

They tumbled out into the sunshine, into the murderous drumbeat, toward the lookouts —

The major was not there. They said he had suddenly become ill and had gone home.

They said there was a new battalion-commander.

He went over to him and reported that he had just now arrived from Budapest, had bought supplies, had —

The new battalion-commander was not a major. He was only a captain. He was sitting on the ground drinking tea. He was sitting on a folded-up blanket covered with a sheet, and a cup of tea was before him. He did not wait until the end. He asked him how he dared disturb him at the table. He asked him where had he learned such civilian manners. He would show him! And he would teach him that promotions should be reported. How dared he show himself at all? He had heard already of him. He knew everything. He would teach him! He would show him! Now, away! He would look over the things he had brought some other time.

He was humiliated. He looked for First Lieutenant Fridek, he tried to find him in the dimness of the death-house. He wanted to give him the photographs, and his wife's letter, if —

Fridek noticed him, pulled him aside, took him to a corner where the captain could not see them.

He gave First Lieutenant Fridek the photograph and the letter. First Lieutenant Fridek read the letter and began to cry. In a trembling voice, deeply touched, he asked:

"Where is the package, my son? The goose-liver with dates — "

He told all about it.

First Lieutenant Fridek's face suddenly grew dark. His eyes were bloodshot. He ground his teeth. His voice drowned the drumfire, drowned the misery, the trembling of the men, drowned the war:

"It's an outrage — It's disgraceful — scandalous — I'll show you — I'll take care of you — outrageous — I'll teach you, don't you be afraid — And I wanted to help you — I wanted to help you — "

He stood there, in the death-house, an outcast. Like a leper.

He saw there was no place for him there. He found Répás, gave him the camera and tumbled out.

He left the fox-hole and started back, toward the realm of the quartermaster.

CHAPTER XIX

HE complained to the quartermaster-captain about his reception. The captain, however, had no time to bother with him. He was issuing orders, supervising packing, looking over figures, calculations, lists, he was feverishly active. The quartermaster-captain was about to move. He told him that they would remain there only until next noon — at the most. Suddenly he turned to him:

"Give me an account of the money."

"Of what money?"

"The money I gave you."

"I took the things to the front line. A few things are still here — "

"I don't mean that. What do I care whether you took it to the line or didn't. I need bills. Haven't you brought the bills with you?"

"I never thought of that."

The front roared threateningly, mysteriously, menacingly.

"That's too bad, you should have. Now you'd better draw up some sort of accounting. I'll try to put it through. Take care, divide the supplies to last for three months, multiply the number of days with the number of officers, the final number with the extra allowance, and that's how you'll get the statement in correct form — "

The telephone rang.

The captain telephoned, from the fox-hole.

He asked whether the aspirant was there, and if so what was he doing there? Who gave him permission to go back? He commanded him to return at once.

The quartermaster gave him one of the receivers, but he would not let him talk. He answered for him. He told the captain that he ordered the aspirant to come back because he had not rendered him an accounting yet. There were many fine delicacies still here, he would not entrust any one else with them. The aspirant would take them to the line at night, when they would go out more safely under the cover of darkness. He would give him a few men to take the things out.

"Hasn't the aspirant brought out any of the Swiss cheese?" the quartermaster-captain asked naïvely.

"No. The aspirant hasn't brought out any Swiss cheese at all. Although we need it very badly. We can't cook now, we can't use the vegetables. We need the Swiss cheese very much — "

The quartermaster gave him a sly wink, hung up the receiver and smiled:

"Never mind him — "

"I certainly do mind him, of course, I do. I'll go back at once."

He had struck up a friendship with the quartermaster, they were great friends, the quartermaster thought very much of him. But now he shook his head disapprovingly and addressed him in a frigid tone:

"Well, you may do whatever you damn please. But you will not go until you have given me an accounting."

He had to sit down. He took out a pencil and began to figure out how much he had spent for the individual items. The night was slowly approaching and he was still multiplying. And subtracting. He tried to remember all the items. The kohlrabi. How much had it been? And then the peas. How much? He used fractions. He was sweating.

Embittered, he went over to the quartermaster:

"Captain, I can't do it. I'd rather pay back every cent you gave me. I haven't been paid yet. Keep that, too. I'll never finish it."

"My son, I don't want your salary. It's there, in an envelope. Take it. It's yours. Here. Sign this. But it isn't the money that I need. I need the accounting. I have already forwarded a receipt for the money. This item is already entered in the books. I don't need the money. I need the accounting. I have to forward that too. I need it."

He took his money and began to work on his calculations again.

Night came and the distant front seemed like a sparkling meadow of fire. The shells exploded but a kilometer or two from the train and thousands and thousands of glowing sparks flew in the night.

Eight times six, eight times six, eight times six, he repeated it mechanically. His lips trembled. Once or twice he discovered that he had made a mistake, that he had to start the whole thing all over again. A groan filtered in through the open window. A wagon rattled by in the darkness. He went out and saw that the wagon was laden with wounded soldiers, thrown on top of each other like ragged, old sacks.

The quartermaster remarked that only those groaned whose bones were broken.

And those who had gone insane.

He knew that because a silly thing had happened in the afternoon, Kovásznai had gone insane. He had been with the train. A simple farmer, he had been sent to the front line with the kitchen and when a bullet had whistled by him, he had gone mad. In a jiffy, just like that. Such things do happen.

After midnight, the captain in the fox-hole telephoned again.

He telephoned that it was now dark enough to bring out the Swiss cheese. And some salami, if there was any. And bread.

He gave the quartermaster the accounting he had somehow drawn up. The quartermaster did not even take a peep at it, he just said: All right. He said he was to give Swiss cheese, and salami, and rolls. Fresh rolls, baked to-day.

It took hours for them to pack the things he had to take out. The quartermaster said it didn't matter whether they hurried or didn't. He regretted that they were parting. He had done him a great favor. The train would start as soon as dawn came. They couldn't stay here. He knew it. They would go back a couple of kilometers. The food they could not carry with them would be destroyed. But he hoped he could take away a lot. The quartermaster did not fear the court-martial now; now he could account for everything. This was what he had been awaiting. This attack. Now, whatever the Quartermaster-General would find missing was left here — or destroyed.

He was amazed. What did he mean to do? To leave one's post just like that? Of what was he thinking? Stupid clerk — did he think that the Russians could possibly cross that field out there with all the barbed-wire fences? and the trenches? and the machine guns? and the bayonets? What did he think, anyway — the defenders would simply surrender and the Russians walk in? What did he think, this unfortunate quartermaster? Why, he had never been out there — what did he know? In three days, everything would be as it had been.

Why, if an attack came, the lookouts would report it. Then the men would leave the fox-holes, the flame-throwers be brought into action — Incredible!

The quartermaster took leave of him very warmly.

"Listen, if you want to stay, stay, or come with me, I'll take you along. I'll shoulder the responsibility, I'll send out some one else with the food."

"I can't, Captain, I can't do it. It's high time that I leave. No one can avoid his fate — and I don't want to — "

"Don't you want to send any message home? Shall I write anything?"

"No. I'll write to-morrow myself."

He picked up the receiver and reported to the captain that he had been unable to start before. He promised to hurry. He was taking fresh rolls with him.

The captain said, very well. Fresh rolls are fine. He was glad. It was very "hot" out there. It's lucky for him that things turned out the way they did. Report as soon as you arrive. I will think it over, I may forget about your incorrect behavior. Hurry up, anyway. Light the fire in the kitchen as soon as you start so that by the time you arrive the food may be ready.

It was dawn when he started with the train. He marched, with the men, slowly after the kitchen. A refreshing, invigorating, happy little breeze tickled his throat. He felt the elasticity of the slightly soaked soil beneath his feet and he deeply inhaled the fragrance of the dewy grass.

The train moved slowly. The men found something to attend to every minute. They stopped. They said the fire ought to be lighted now. They pottered around. He urged them to hurry, but they paid no attention to him. They opened the kettle, stirred the soup, closed it again. They said it was no good. The fire went out. From where they started the front was but an hour's march, they should have arrived a long time ago. They had been marching for four hours.

They reached the board-walk. The hill was beyond it, and beyond the hill, the front line. The fox-holes, the look-outs, First Lieutenant Fridek, whose goose-liver with dates was eaten up by infantrymen on the way.

The water splashed, sudden gushes rose in the swamp here and there. He thought frogs jumped in the water.

Suddenly a high jet of mud rose not far from them and one of the soldiers fell into the water.

The soldiers stopped. They waited for their comrade to come to the surface. Then they said: He's done for. They said they were not frogs — Shells.

Bullets splashed in the water.

The horses started and jumped. The sergeant said they could not go on any further.

"Why not?"

"Because the horses don't want to. I'll go back and try another road. They don't want to go here."

The kitchen cared nothing for him. It simply turned around and left him there. The men all wanted to go with the kitchen.

He had no authority over the kitchen. And it was possible that they knew better which road to take.

"Some one must come with me — "

Nobody moved.

He took out his revolver.

"Three men will come with me and each of them will carry a sack. Rolls, cheese, salami — "

CHAPTER XX

THEY marched on, each of his men carrying a bag on his shoulders. One bag contained rolls, one salami, the third one cheese. The men also carried their rifles, and their haversacks. The nearer they got to the hill, the more frequently they heard invisible and strange insects buzz by. He knew they were steel-bullets. And what shrilly whistled was also a steel-bullet. What splashed the muddy water was also a steel-bullet. The clouds above the hill showered splinters, the invisible drums beat a march of death. And yet it was not terrifying. Perhaps, because nothing had happened to him. He could not feel it; the fear of death could not start and revolt and shiver within him. He had put the revolver away. The three men marched resignedly; he did not need the revolver.

It was curious, he reflected. To-day was the first day that he had taken out his revolver. He had not taken it out of its holster in battle. He had not taken it out before the enemy. He had taken it out for the first time to-day. Because of the salami. No: because of discipline. Of course, of course! Nevertheless, the fact remained a fact: he had taken it out for the first time to-day and, one couldn't help it, one had to admit it, he had taken it out because of the cheese —

The May sun shone brightly and the men carried their heavy burden with drooping shoulders. The realization disturbed and stirred him. He wanted to make amends for having taken out the revolver. He could not go on with such a tremendous weight on his conscience, with such a blemish on his soul.

He stopped his men:

"Let's rest a little — "

He caressed them with his words, he spoke apologizingly, he expected a friendly echo.

"We can't rest now, sir — We've got to get out of this hell — "

Something hissed and dived into the water, unknown forces stirred, cut, splashed the sea of mud.

Without stopping even for a second, the soldiers hurried forward, puffing and blowing, sweating, exhausted.

They reached the hill at the end of the board-walk. Metal objects glistened in the sun, a few steps from him. He recognized them with joy. They were shell-fuses, of copper. He decided to take one home with him. A memento. They are worth something only when you pick them up yourself. He would certainly take one home. He raced up the hillside, for the shell-fuses. He did not stop the men, he knew he would overtake them in no time anyway. He ran as lightly as if he had been chasing butterflies on the hillsides of Gércz, as if he had been running after flowers at the edge of the Vécsey Forest. Carefree and light-hearted, he picked up a fuse.

It burned his hand. The fuse was still hot. He reached for another one. That was cold already. He put it into his pocket and hurried back to his men. He did not see them. He looked around. Where were they? He discovered them squatting in a freshly cut shell-hole.

He dashed to them.

"What's that? What's going on here?"

The men pulled him down by his feet and pressed his head to the ground.

What was going on here?

The men pointed excitedly toward a curve in the hillside.

He saw soldiers standing there. About thirty of them. There might have been even more. But he could not see any more on account of the curve. They wore very long coats and their caps were of a peculiar shape.

The soldiers were barely fifty feet away. They yelled at them and waved their hands. He could not make out what they wanted. Who were they?

He had never before seen soldiers like them.

They all carried rifles. Why, they were Russians! But if they were Russians, why did they still have their equipment? Why did these Russians still carry their rifles?

Two long-coated men left the group and came toward them.

One of his men suddenly took his revolver out of its holster and threw it out of the shell-hole.

The long-coated men came running toward them, carrying their rifles at trail arms.

What was to come next?

The two strangers shouted even louder now, they waved their hands even more frantically. But he could not imagine what they wanted of him.

They reached the shell-hole. One of them grabbed him by his right arm, the other one, by his left. And they began to run with him. He could not keep pace with them, they ran much faster than he did, their legs were longer than his, and in the suddenly created atmosphere of uncertainty, he felt lost. They ran with him so fast that he almost broke his legs. Suddenly he lifted his feet in the air. Now he was hanging in the air, his feet dangling.

It occurred to him that he had often been playfully carried thus by his parents when still a little child.

They reached the group of long-coated men.

He realized now that they really were Russians. But how did they ever get here and why did they still have their rifles?

The two Russians would not let go of him. Two others hurried back to the shell-hole for his men.

The Russians yelled at him, but he could not make out what they wanted.

They searched him. They took the shell-fuse out of his pocket and threw it far away. They shook his fountain pen menacingly before his nose. He took it out of the Russian's hand and demonstrated its use on his hand. He showed them his inky palm, whereupon they smiled and good-humoredly put it back in his pocket. They did not find any dangerous firearms on him.

His three men had also been brought to the group.

He regained his composure. He asked his men where they had left their sacks.

In the shell-hole.

He told the Russians, in sign language, that it would be a good idea to bring over the sacks. He smacked his lips and moved his jaws. Thus he called to their attention the fact that the sacks contained food. The Russians hurried to the shell-hole once more and brought back the bags.

He opened them and showed the Russians the rolls. They pounced down upon them.

But he had gotten his bearings already. He took their commander by the arm and began to talk to him in Hungarian although he knew the Russian did not understand one word of it. But he interspersed his talk with signs and somehow he managed to convey to the commander the idea that he wanted to distribute the rolls among them. And forthwith he began to deal them out. Indeed, there were only about thirty of them. He gave each one two rolls. They took them quietly and with discipline. He gave two rolls to each of his men, too, and put two into his own bread-bag. To the commander, he gave four.

Then he took out his pocket-knife and began to distribute the salami and the cheese. Each portion was equally large, he was very just. Those who got their share turned aside and began to eat greedily. When he saw that some salami was left over, he gave every man a second helping.

"Come on, boys, here's your chance to get your bellies full," he said, and although the Russians did not understand a word of it, they smiled. They sensed that what he said was something of a joke.

He distributed all the food he had and then he found a bunch of papers at the bottom of the third sack. At first, he did not know what they were. He pulled out one sheet and a cold shiver ran down his spine.

Highly unpleasant! He had forgotten all about them. There were handbills in the sack, about a thousand of them. Short, poignant proclamations. He had been instructed to take them to the front line and to smuggle them over to the Russian lines. They were calls upon the Russian soldiers. In Russian. He had received a Hungarian translation of it so that he should know what they were about. A call upon the Russian soldiers! Throw away your arms! Surrender! You are fighting for a lost cause! Your commanders deceive you, they will not tell you that we have won a decisive victory! They keep the fall of Kut-el-Amara a secret from you!

The Russian commander joined him and began to examine the sacks. He did not find anything in the first two. But he noticed the handbills in the last one. He did not look into the sack, however, he just sank his hand into it and searched around in it for a second. Nothing. Only paper.

Then he rose and kicked the sacks aside.

Two soldiers were detailed to take the four of them away. The commander gave his men an order of which he understood but one word: kapitán —

Well, kapitán. They apparently would take them to the captain. But, perhaps, kapitán meant "head" in the Russian? Perhaps the command contained some reference to his head, something about beheading —

The Russian commander shook hands with him and patted him on the back. Then he turned away and commanded his men to fall in line. Some of them were still chewing at the rolls, the salami, the cheese.

They were taken back to the Russian lines.

They were led through the well-known communication trenches leading to the fox-holes. The familiar turns reminded him of the battalion-commander and First Lieutenant Fridek. Perhaps they were taking him to them? What was happening to him, anyway? What had happened here? And if they were about to take him to the captain how was he going to account for the loss of the rolls? And for the salami? Was he going to be bawled out again? for the cheese? or for the handbills?

Nonsense!

One of his men sighed:

"We've been taken prisoners, sir — "

We have been taken prisoners — Yes — Yes — Nothing had happened because — because of First Lieutenant Fridek — nothing because of the goose-liver with dates that was stolen — Nothing because of the incorrect report — Nothing because of his bad manners at the table —

"We have been taken prisoners."

CHAPTER XXI

THEY reached the fox-holes. But he could see no terrified lookouts now, the trenches swarmed with Russian soldiers. They were lying and squatting behind the parapets, shooting. But they were shooting in the opposite direction: in the direction of the quartermaster's quarters. It was queer to see them shooting at First Lieutenant Fridek, at the cornets who had grown their beards in vain, because they would not have a chance to show them at home. And he reflected that there would be no kicking because of the dinner to-night, that no one would get insulted on account of the anisette. Perhaps even Fridek forgot to worry about the goose-liver with dates. And the captain too had other things to worry about than his civilian manners at the table. The long-coated men and Csutor's son were shooting at each other now. They were shooting at each other right in front of him.

The two Russians who accompanied them stopped. Standing at attention, they yelled something to some one standing on the parapet. A Russian officer turned to them. His face was covered with dust, he carried, at his side, a map and a revolver. Just like our officers. And he held a field-glass in his hand, too, just as our officers. The Russian officer turned to them and he looked sad and dejected as if he had been suddenly awakened from his sleep. One of the Russians reported something. The officer nodded and looked straight at him. He felt that he had to say something. He raised his hand to his cap and saluted. But the Russian officer continued to gaze at him absent-mindedly. Embarrassed, he felt at his collar. The collar of his shirt, according to the custom in the field, was pulled out to cover the collar of his tunic. Now he lifted his shirt-collar and showed the Russian officer his brand-new insignia. The Russian up there nodded again. From up there, from Death's threshold, the Russian officer nodded down to him, to his comrade, and politely, courteously raised his hand to his cap. Then he turned away. He merely begged his pardon for not being able to entertain him. For not being able to be with the guest. Alas. Please, don't hold it against me. He said something to the men who were escorting him. Apparently he gave them some instructions. Then he saluted again and turned away.

A soldier standing next to the officer now turned around and stared at them. The Russian soldier stared at them, then, of a sudden, he began to yell and to shout. His face was bloody, there were black blotches on his cheeks, his hair was disheveled and patches of it protruded from below his cap. The Russian soldier shouted and shook his fists and cursed and gesticulated with his rifle, then suddenly lifted the rifle against his shoulder and aimed at him. He saw the Russian's bloodshot eye taking aim, he saw the little black hole in the muzzle.

He let out a yell. He could not understand what the Russian soldier said but he felt that something terrible was in store for him and when he saw the rifle in the Russian's hand aimed at him, when he saw the little black hole, he began to yell, too.

He did not understand the Russian but he saw what he wanted, he knew that the Russian would not understand him, either, but he knew what to say:

"You lousy coward! You bastard! Now that I have no rifle with me! Now that I am a prisoner!"

He was furious. He tore open his tunic, thrust out his chest and banged it with his fist:

"Shoot here, louse! Shoot here, you dog, shoot, bastard!"

The officer up on the parapet sadly and calmly took out his revolver and pointed it at his man:

"Andrey — "

The soldier suddenly grew calm. He let the rifle drop and turned away. Then he raised the rifle again and took aim. But now he aimed it at Fridek.

The Russian officer saluted again. Then he looked no more at him. He buttoned up his tunic and excitedly, red in the face, marched off with the Russian soldiers. They took him to a captain. A machine-gun captain with a long beard. He was calm now. The Russians, when they reported, said: Kapitán. So this word really meant captain. So he would not be beheaded. The captain did not want to talk to them. He was busy with the machine gun and angrily waved them aside. But he did throw one little glance at them. He caught this glance and, lifting his shirt-collar again, showed the captain the handsome narrow gold and yellow stripes and the three shining stars. The insignia of a First Class Aspirant. The Russian captain leaped to his feet, left his machine gun for a second, shook hands with him, then told the two soldiers where to take him and the three other prisoners.

They were now walking in a narrow communication trench. It was so narrow that two men could walk side by side only with difficulty. Russian soldiers came running toward them, they were hurrying to the first-line trenches. They had to press themselves close against the wall of the trench, he even pulled in his stomach, in order to let the enemy pass by comfortably. They did not care about the prisoners. A curious mixture of doggedness and unpleasant anxiety was written on their features.

A strange smell pervaded these trenches. A sour smell. The odor of raw leather. A smell different from the one in his own trenches. These troops had a different odor than his own men.

No wonder that ants recognize their enemy from their smell. Different ants have different odors. And men are amazed when they read about this in a book —

These troops were going against Fridek. And against the captain. And against Répás. And against Csutor's son. They were out to kill Csutor's son. That lean fellow was leading them, the one that had darted by without looking at him. It was possible that, in an hour, the lean fellow would also shout: "Shoot here, you louse." Yes, what did that soldier think, anyway? He must have been a stupid and unchivalrous man. For — after all — a peasant could also be chivalrous, he could also be decent and human. He could even be clever. He should have known that he — yes — that he was not supposed to shoot backward — His business was to shoot forward — He was not supposed to shoot at the poor prisoners. But? But at poor Répás? At the poor bearded cornets! Well, yes! That's the regulation — that's the regulation — but then, after all —

Fortunately the officer saw at once what was wanted. Immediately he pointed his revolver at him. Immediately he made him harmless. The Russian officer pointed his revolver at the soldier. Just as he had done it, this morning. He too had pointed his revolver at his own men. Was that also a regulation? Yes. Discipline. War cannot be carried on without discipline. But, after all —

They marched in the trench and it occurred to him that the little old woman would, after all, cross the Vécsey Forest with the telegram.

Fridek will report that he has disappeared. The captain will report it to Mr. Kun, from there the news will go on in a typewritten report and, next Saturday, his name will be printed in the casualty lists. Died, unaccounted for, wounded. His name will be among the "disappeared." They will surely wire to his relatives that he was unaccounted for. The woman carrying the telegram will undoubtedly stop at Mrs. Deák's tavern, near Pusztahegy. She will tell them that she is delivering a telegram. The telegram will arrive on Friday. Father will put on his spectacles. His poor wife — how she will cry! And poor mother, how her heart will ache! Poor, poor mother, she will regret that she ever said anything about not worrying for him. It will hurt her deeply. Pain will twitch her features and she will cry bitterly. She will remember the day when she called him to her bedroom and said to him: I won't worry for you, son, you will know your way about — you will come back. And then he will write that he has been taken prisoner and then all of them will be happy and poor mother will be right after all. But how could any one have known it in advance?

Didn't he come through a field strewn with shells? Didn't he come through the enemy lines? Didn't they want to shoot him after he had been captured? Didn't that angry Russian soldier take aim at him? Didn't death buzz and whistle and hiss around him and above him? How had his mother known that he would get out of all this without a scratch? How could she have known that? And now — Was it so certain that he was safe? How could he have known it? Who knew what was waiting for him? Perhaps this was only the beginning —

One of the Russian soldiers had been walking, for the past quarter of an hour or so, in the open field. Now he suddenly jumped back into the trench. He grinned, happily, and showed him his leg. He had gotten a bullet in his leg, just below the knee. He was happy now, because he had gotten a wound. He limped along with shining eyes and a radiant face. But what would happen to them? What next?

They had been walking already for an hour and a half.

They had already passed the artillery batteries, they had already passed the train. Now they had come to a charming little spring. Near by, there was a tent and soldiers were crowding around it. The tent was atop a knoll. They climbed it. There a bearded Russian officer received them. They shook hands like friends, and it was clear that the Russian wanted to talk with him. But the Russian spoke neither Hungarian nor German. They could not talk. But they shook each other's hands several times.

He remembered that there were several tablets of chocolate and a pint of szilvorium, along with his safety razor, in his bread-bag. Fine Gércz szilvorium, his father had sent it to him to Budapest, with his wife. He took out the bottle and offered a drink to the Russian officer. The Russian uncorked it, sniffed at it, then suspiciously gave it back.

Of course. First he must take a gulp of it, he must show him that it was no poison. Of course.

He took a big gulp but before he could take the bottle from his lips the Russian officer tore it out of his hands and lifted it to the sky with a joyous smile.

The good, old Gércz szilvorium flowed noisily out of the greenish bottle and rushed gratefully down the Russian officer's throat, gurgling merrily. At the threshold of the infinite Sarmatian steppes, the fine, old Gércz szilvorium gurgled in the hands of an officer of the Czar. . . .

CHAPTER XXII

THE Russian officer took a deep gulp of the szilvorium, then warmly shook his hands. He told him, in pantomime, to take off his tunic. He did not understand this. The Russian pointed to his collar, went through the pantomime again, pointed to the collar again.

He did not know, he could not imagine, why he should take off his tunic. What did the Russian want, why did he need the tunic, wasn't the szilvorium enough, did he want to take his tunic, too?

But he took off his tunic and the Russian officer gave it to one of his men. The soldier nodded and disappeared in the tent.

He was discomfited but the Russian patted him on the back and smiled and assured him that there was nothing to worry about. He advised him, with gestures, not to get excited.

He sat quietly, a few thousand feet from the scene of the horrible butchery, in a foreign land, on a foreign knoll, at the edge of the Sarmatian steppes, with a few tablets of chocolate in his bread-bag, with a safety razor in his pocket; he sat quietly in his shirtsleeves, with his Doctor of Laws degree, in the enemy's country, far away from the green hills above which gently towered the white-topped Mount Mike of the Avas; he sat quietly and he saw before him his wife and his son and the yard of his father's farm and he felt the sunshine hovering about it and he saw the well and the little brook —

The Russian officer went into the tent and brought out his tunic and pointed to the collar of the tunic, with a happy grin on his face.

The Russian officer had sewn the insignia of a cornet on his collar. There were only the narrow gold stripe and one star on his collar now. The Russian officer had promoted him.

He had to be grateful for the promotion, he had to act as if he liked it. Of course, the man was drunk — otherwise he would not have played such a joke on him. The szilvorium was too strong for him. But what could he do?

He was impatiently waiting to be sent away. He wanted to get away from this drunken fool. Who could tell what he would do next? He had heard that some men liked to put over practical jokes when they were drunk, and such a sot here, who could tell, at the end he might even —

They were taken away, to a house. There were scores of prisoners around, he did not know one of them, they all belonged to other regiments. They all must have been captured to-day. They sat silently on the ground and stared grimly, darkly ahead of them. He tried to find an officer but there were only a few non-coms around, a couple of corporals, a sergeant or two.

At last he was taken to a Russian officer of high rank who sat at a small table beneath a tree. The table was covered with white cloth. A translator was called in who put to him questions in German. They asked his name, and his assignment, the number of his regiment, the names of his superiors. They did not care about the others, they questioned only him. They asked him to tell them precisely where he had been captured. They put a map in front of him, he had to point out the place where he had been taken prisoner. He had used the same map, he pointed out the spot correctly. He even felt a slight sensation of interest when he passed his finger through the board-walk, yes, here it had happened, here he had come, here, yes, this morning —

The translator, who spoke a very bad German, told him that that was all, and that he might sit down anywhere he pleased. If they needed him again they would call him.

He sat down beneath a big tree and leaned his head against its trunk. He was very tired. It was growing dark and he had been on his feet for well-nigh two days. The translator came up to him and engaged him in conversation. The translator lied at first, he claimed to have been in Budapest for years, as a hotel-portier, he said he had learned his German there. He said that he had been a spy and that no one had noticed it, he had been very cunning and shrewd, no one in Budapest had suspected anything. The translator's obvious and stupid lies maddened him. How could he have been in Budapest when he did not understand one word of Hungarian? He asked the translator what hotel was opposite the Café New York — if he had been in Budapest for years, he should have known it. The translator was embarrassed and kept silent. Then he said he remembered it, wasn't it the Hotel Vienna? No, it was not.

Then the translator turned the conversation into another channel, he said this was, thank God, the final victory, Brussilov had dealt a death blow to the entire Austro-Hungarian Army, the war was over, now there would be only a few insignificant skirmishes with the Turks, but the Central Powers were beaten already, Brussilov had beaten them to rags to-day —

He began to argue with him. He asked sarcastically whether he thought that we did not know anything about Kut-el-Amara's fall?

The translator frowned and asked what had fallen.

"Kut-el-Amara. Die Russen kämpfen umsonst."

The translator laughed, he said he did not think that that Kut-el-Amara business was true. But it was evident that he had never been in Budapest, and that he knew nothing about Kut-el-Amara.

The translator did not like the Kut-el-Amara theme. He began to talk about something else. He said he would be well treated, he did not need to be afraid. Russia treated all prisoners very well, although Germany did not deserve such treatment. "All prisoners have a good time here," he said, "especially the officers. The officers are regularly paid fifty rubles a month. It's more than plenty. It's good for you that you are an officer already. Your stripe is brand-new; it shows that you haven't been an officer for long."

"Do you know our insignia?"

Of course. A soldier with a white bone star on his collar is not an officer. With a yellow stripe and three stars, not an officer either. Gold stripe, yellow stripe and three stars, doubtful. This question is just being settled in Moscow but, for the time being, it hasn't been decided yet whether such soldiers will be treated as officers or not. But a gold stripe with one star is an officer. They consider him an officer, he is entitled to the fifty rubles and he does not have to work.

His heart began to beat faster. So the Russian officer had not been drunk when he had promoted him.

He had merely paid for the szilvorium.

He had promoted him that there should be no argument over him, that he should get the monthly fifty rubles, that he should not have to work —

The translator was called away but he came back in a few minutes and told him in a hoarse voice that something terrible had happened, the court-martial was in session in the house, he was to go in.

He was taken to the house where a great number of Russian officers were sitting at a hurriedly put together table shaped like a horseshoe. He was led before the presiding officer and the translator told him that abominable things had happened, he would have to account for them, because he was the only officer among the prisoners in this sector.

They shoved a bullet under his nose and sarcastically asked him whether he had ever seen it. Whether he had known that his soldiers had used such bullets. They said, however, that his fate would be the same even if he had not known it.

They handed him the bullet. He looked at it, examined it.

"What's the matter with this bullet?"

"The colonel wishes to know why the steel-covering is rasped off. This was not done in the factory, this was done by the troops, at the command of their inhuman and revengeful officers. How did they dare to shoot with dumdum bullets? When international agreements expressly forbid their use."

He had heard already that such rasped-off bullets caused frightful wounds. But he heard the word dumdum for the first time now. Nor had he ever seen such a bullet before.

The Russian colonel was yelling at him. He asked him: Is this chivalry, is this Christianity? There's nothing you can bring up in your defense, such bullets were used because the officers ordered them, and now you will pay for such bestiality.

They took him out again, but now he was guarded by two privates with fixed bayonets. The translator was also infuriated. He came out after him, for he also was not permitted to be present while the court-martial deliberated. He said that he would never have thought that they were capable of such barbarity. Abominable.

The presiding officer sent for him.

The colonel asked him again whether they were regularly using these brutal bullets, whether they were being made on high authority. He could, perhaps, escape his fate yet. If he confessed everything, he might escape what was for an officer utterly humiliating, the gallows. In that case he would be, as befitted an officer, put before a firing squad.

He answered that this was the first time he had ever seen a dumdum bullet, he had never known what it was like, he had never known how they were made, he had thought that only those bullets were called dumdums which exploded, he had never heard of such ammunition. He requested permission to ask the soldiers about it, permission to speak a few words to them.

He was taken out again. He looked around. Dull and leaden fatigue pervaded him. The big tree where he would be hanged rose ghastly before him; with his soul, he was taking leave of the little brook wherein his little son was splashing about now, and wearily he began to speak:

"Men, I'm going to be hanged now because they've found on one of you a rasped-off bullet. They don't know and I don't know to whom that bullet belonged but they are going to hang me just the same. Don't tell me who the man was who owned that bullet, it makes no difference any more, at the most they will hang him next to me — But who, in God's name, told you to rasp off the bullets?"

One of the soldiers lazily rose. He saluted and reported:

"I beg to report, sir, that bullet was mine — "

"Why in hell do you say so, you unfortunate fool? I asked you not to — "

"Why shouldn't I tell it? I rasped it off myself. Now I can take it out of the shell more easily. I have taken the powder out of it and the upper part of the bullet is fixed up as a whistle, that's why it's rasped off. I made it myself, it's a fine whistle — "

Hope was returning to him, he went back to the court-martial and asked for the bullet.

He took the bullet out of its copper shell, turned it, blew into it, and the tiny steel-whistle shrilly and triumphantly echoed in the little room the returning hopes of his miserable and receding little life.

The colonel smiled and suddenly understood everything He realized that it was not inhumanity, merely a toy. He stepped to him and patted him on the shoulder. He even shook hands with him.

The colonel said that he had been falsely and erroneously accused of a crime. As a compensation, he might sleep in the room to-night, if he wanted to, and not in the garden.

CHAPTER XXIII

WHEN the Russian colonel told him that he might sleep in the house, all the excitement and all the fatigue of two days and a night descended upon him at once. Infinite tiredness closed his eyelids and by the time he stretched out on the floor, he was already fast asleep. He woke with a start: some one was mercilessly shaking him. He thought he had been lying thus collapsed for a few minutes only, but he must have been sleeping a long time for it was morning now and the sun shone brightly.

He was ordered to leave the room.

The open field swarmed with prisoners. With an immense number of prisoners. There were officers among them now and yesterday's lethargy was supplanted by a strange liveliness. Russian non-coms were searching the prisoners. They took the cameras away from the officers, tore up their papers and the pink field-postal-cards they found in the pockets of the privates. But the Russians could not search all of them, there were too many prisoners, theirs was merely guesswork.

They had to take off their boots and the Russians felt around inside them, they had to unbutton their tunics and the Russians searched under their shirts. A Russian soldier ordered him to open his mouth. Meekly he obeyed and the Russian thrust his filthy paw into his mouth and he felt the touch of the cold and dirty fingers on his tongue. The Russian tried to break the gold crown off one of his teeth but now he began to yell at the top of his voice. The Russian soldier ran away and officers arrived who put an end to the looting and searching. But by that time, something was taken away from practically every one of them.

Food, blankets, safety-razors and the little bags which hung around their necks and in which they kept their money under their shirts.

The Russian officers ordered mounted Cossacks to guard them and the Cossacks surrounded them with their seven-foot lances and herded them together. He lost the three men with whom he had been captured, he was now in the midst of strangers. They started to go, in huge masses, intimidated and stumbling at every other step, driven on by the yells, the lances and the cats-o'-nine-tails of the Cossacks.

He had only one wish: to get to the edge of the marching masses. There he would not have to step on any one's heel, there no one would be stepping on his heels, there he would not feel the beastly stench of the mob. But those at the edge held on to their positions and those inside would not let him go. A second lieutenant was somehow swept next to him; one of his eyes was bandaged, the other one half closed. He tried hard to keep it open but he could not. My name is Lányi, allow me to lean on you, I am half blinded, said the second lieutenant, and took him by the arm and leaned on him. The masses just marched on, no one knew where, no one knew either the country, or the road, or their destination. Painfully he staggered along with the second lieutenant on his arm; he could hardly drag himself and now there was this second lieutenant also. He remembered: he had been taught of such things in school, of Samaritans, but when one read of them sitting on a school-bench, or at home in bed, one merely smiled, deprecatingly. What of it, to help a wounded comrade! It's a duty and something of an effort, one said, and waved it aside.

That was just what he was doing now, and how insufferable it was, what an incredible effort! It was maddening, the fatigue was driving him insane, he could hardly drag the blind comrade any longer, he thought that they would both collapse in a second, and then they would be trampled to death by those who followed them.

The colossal weight of the second lieutenant hung on his arm and on his chest and on his shoulders, the silent second lieutenant pulled him down. He tried to get to the side, at least to get air, at least to have just a little more elbow-room to drag him along: but they cruelly pushed him back and bawled him out; don't crowd, don't kick, stay where you are.

Sweat and the stench of perspiration and suffocating stink whirled about them. All the breath-taking, foul odor settled on this narrow strip of a road where the prisoners marched.

They marched and their throats became dry, they marched and they put their feet mechanically one before the other, they marched and the road had nowhere an end. They marched and little pools of water glistened in the sun and thirst tormented them. He had never known this either: what it meant to be thirsty, as it was described in novels and in the Bible, he had never known that sensation either. All feeling of nausea, all feeling of fastidiousness disappeared, the men looked longingly and covetously at the pools covered with weed; they imagined that they would be instantly transported to heaven if only they could drink of them.

It was noon. The Cossacks stopped the column.

A translator announced that those who drank of the wheel tracks or of the puddles would be immediately shot to death. This water spread typhus.

They squatted and knelt and sat in the dust and longingly stared at the water in the wheel tracks and covetously at the mossy pools.

He told Lányi that he had chocolate in his bag and suggested to him that they eat some.

Lányi covered his mouth with his palm and whispered back to him to keep silent.

"There are others who also have food. There are even some who have water in their flasks. Can't you see that no one touches his bag? They are all afraid of the others —"

There he sat on the road to Kiev and there was chocolate in his bag, but he dared not take it out because of the other starving men. The Samaritan dared not take the chocolate out of his bag because there were other hungry ones around him. And there were some who had water in their flasks and they dared not drink it, either.

There they sat, quivering and shivering with hunger and looking squarely in each other's eyes and watching jealously and anxiously each other's every gesture, and no one dared touch his food, his drink, they dared not drink nor eat for fear of each other. The man who showed that he had a bit of bread would have been torn to pieces on the spot. There they sat and not even the sick men, the men suffering from fever, could have a gulp of water. Those who still had something sat there indifferently, they would not betray even with their eyes that they had something. There they sat and hated each other with deadly hatred. They would have liked to run off to distant forests, there to hide in order to gobble up their chocolate undisturbed, greedily, with saliva oozing out of their mouths. They stared at each other with protruding eyes and the hidden food and the hidden flask of water burned them like dangerous explosives.

When they rose, they were more tired than they had been before the rest. But they marched on mechanically and shattered. The colossal weight of Second Lieutenant Lányi pulled him down with incredible force. He felt as if his right side where Lányi hung on to him had been torn out of his body.

"Please, comrade, come to my left side, let's change places."

After many tries and experiments, Lányi managed to come to his left, but after a few minutes of relief, he felt the weight even more than before. Now he would have liked to have Lányi back in the original position, for there his side was already wholly insensible, but this would have been a very daring and very dangerous experiment.

He had to go on, because those behind him stepped on his heels, on his ankle, with their spiked boots, whenever he fell out of step, whenever he slowed down even for a second.

When they saw a village from afar, their hopes rose, they thought that was their goal. They dragged themselves on and they reached the village and then they left the village again, the few miserable houses and the small church with its garlic-shaped roof. And they marched on with burnt-out hopes. In every tree, in every cabin they saw the castle of their hopes, they approached the deserted barns as if they had been sacred walls.

The silent and wordless march went on forever, with the mercilessness and certainty of the grave.

Late in the afternoon, in the desperate struggle of the march, he turned to Lányi:

"What happened to your eyes?"

"They beat me."

"Who did? When?"

"When they took away the machine gun. They are very sore at the machine gunners."

"They've also got machine guns. Why are they sore at ours?"

"Makes no difference. They are sore at them. Krisztinkovich — Did you know Krisztinkovich?"

"No, I didn't."

"Well, Krisztinkovich was with me and I was lucky that he was still moving when they shot him. Krisztinkovich was still moving, and the Russian was very angry and he shot all the cartridges of his revolver into him. He shot at him until he had no more cartridges left and then he came after me and that was my luck because he had no time to load it and so he just began to beat me with the butt of his unloaded revolver. He beat me until I collapsed. I can't remember what happened next, the Russians took me back. I was lucky that Krisztinkovich was still moving. And I am lucky that I am not blinded. I think I won't lose my eyesight. I can already see with one of them. How did they get you?"

"They just did — Wasn't very interesting — "

"Were you also in the fox-holes?"

"No."

"Because most of them were just herded together from the fox-holes. What an asinine idea that was! Although, if there hadn't been any fox-holes — But — We don't know what we should have done — Who knows how we should have done it — "

Evening came and in the distance shone fixed and definite lights. The news spread that there the march would end. They marched now with renewed hope and strength. They marched toward the little dots of light, but hour passed after hour and yet they came no nearer to them.

The distant lights were still far away. Hour passed after hour and suddenly, when they least expected it, they were there. There were electric lights. They hung over the door of a large frame shed.

Those who knew Russian forwarded the command. There were Russian officers in the frame shed. The prisoners were forbidden to enter it. They were to sleep in the open. The exhausted men sat down where they stood. They sat down on the wet grass and leaned against each other.

As if they had been mowed down, they spread out on the field.

He saw a dark something at the edge of the human field. He thought it was an abandoned wagon. Anything — if only it could serve as a bed.

He went nearer to it and he saw that it was an oven, half collapsed. Its mouth was intact and part of its roof, too. He bent down and thrust his hand into it. There were ashes still in it.

He called Lányi and shared with him the half-collapsed oven.

They climbed into the oven and stretched out in the divine ashes.

CHAPTER XXIV

IN the morning, when the delight of sleep had gone and they crawled out of the oven, they looked at each other with nausea. They were filthy, disgusting, and hungry. It was a humiliating feeling rather than a disgusting one.

"I don't know how it is," said Lányi, "but it seems we ought to feel proud now. We've suffered for the good of the country, and if we are hungry now it is not because of ourselves and if we are dirty like swine it is not because of ourselves. I slept in the ashes in the interest of higher ideals and my face is smoky and bloody in the interest of a sublime goal. And yet — all this — this wallowing — it is as if we were outlawed — excommunicated — "

They shook out their clothes and stood, all naked, without any feeling of shame, among all these thousands of men. They tried to cleanse themselves. Hundreds of others also stood all naked and also shook their shirts, their clothes. When they put them on again, the coolness of the shirt, of the tunic, brought back to them the fugitive illusion of cleanness. As if the stuffiness of the clothes and of the shirt had gone.

More columns of prisoners were arriving, and, by noon, many thousands of them filled the field. Nobody paid any attention to them. Russian officers with shiny shoulder-straps hurried in and out of the frame shed. Cossack squadrons raced round the field and the prisoners were not permitted to pass outside the chain of the Cossack guards.

They gazed longingly at an old wagon standing peacefully on the highway. A small Russian boy was lying in it drowsily swinging his whip, chasing away flies.

An airplane or two whirred in the air, beneath the snow-white cirri, and geese grazed at the edge of a distant village.

"Russian geese — "

Toward noon, the Cossacks began to shout again. They again herded them together with their long lances and then started them off. Lányi figured that there were ten thousand of them there.

"I wonder what the official communiqués at home will say — "

After about ten minutes, they reached the railroad tracks.

"And really," said Lányi, "really, it is wider than ours, look — "

Well, it is wider. Although, if one is not an expert, if one knows nothing about gauges, one can hardly notice that it is wider. Here, too, there are shrubs along the tracks, and telegraph poles, too. Drying clothes hang in the gardens and they don't seem to be cut in a different way. There are little stores in the villages, just as at home, only these people here don't advertise Franck Coffee. Mauthner sells no seeds here although seeds are sold just the same; there are little shelves in the shops here, too, and the streets are full of dirty-faced little boys and the women are just as curious, they all rush to the fences as they march by, to take a look at them.

And the leaves of the willow-trees are just as narrow here as they are at home, and the grass is just as cool and green —

They boarded a train. It was said that they would travel a few hours only and then reach their destination. But no one knew what the destination was. Nor were there any explanations. Lányi told him he had got acquainted with a certain Szivacsek who spoke Russian, they'd better watch him and not lose sight of him.

"Where did Szivacsek learn Russian?"

"He comes from North Hungary. I think, from Nyitra."

"And they speak Russian up there?"

"No, they speak Slovak, but that's very much like Russian."

Interesting, he had never known that Slovak was like Russian. Oh, yes, of course, they were both Slav, why, of course. It's lucky to have Szivacsek around!

Szivacsek got into the same wagon and promised to stay with them. Szivacsek had a silver medal for bravery, first class, on his chest, and now he envied him even more. It was not enough that Szivacsek understood Russian, he even had a first-class silver. He had also been recommended for the second-class silver, but he would never get it.

Lányi was explaining to Szivacsek how it had happened to him, what with the machine gun and the revolver, and all that. Yesterday his face had been all swollen and he could hardly see, now it was much better. Lányi said that he would draw up a deposition and asked the two of them to sign it, testifying that when they had first met him his face had still been swollen and that he could not see — Szivacsek did not need to worry about the truth of his statement, the marks of the beating were still on his face, although he could see already — Szivacsek nodded gravely in agreement, but he could not understand why. He asked the two others what the deposition was good for.

Lányi explained to him that when they eventually returned home everybody would have to prove that he had not been cowardly, and that was why he needed the deposition. Furthermore, he hoped that he would get the Signum Laudis, at least that, and that they would send the medal after him, to Russia. He had deserved it. Of course, he expected to have it sent to him in Russia only if they should not return soon. But he needed the deposition under all circumstances. And the signatures of two officers. He concluded that the signatures of two officers were enough to make the document authentic.

"Let me put down your names, regiments and ranks — "

Lányi took out a note-book and suddenly he felt his heart sink. The train was approaching Kiev, many-towered churches appeared on the horizon. Russian soldiers loitered at the crossings and gazed at them with wide-open eyes, a soldier with fixed bayonet stood in the door, the freight car was racing with them to an unknown destiny, and yet he felt his heart sink just because Lányi asked his rank. What would happen now? Which of his ranks should he tell them? The one he had received from the Russian officer? A nice exoneration that would be —

"My rank — I don't quite — it didn't arrive — "

"That's all right, as long as it was mentioned in the orders of the day — "

"It wasn't — "

"Then I don't understand it — How was it with your regiment?"

He could not explain it now, especially not with Szivacsek there. Reluctantly and hesitatingly, he stammered it out:

"Cornet."

Lányi told them that he would have the deposition ready in Kiev and then they would sign it.

They saw a wide river and on the farther bank of the river, on a slope, a beautiful city.

Kiev — Kiev — The Battle of Kiev —

It began to hum, to tinkle within him, an old, faint melody, of long-forgotten books, etchings, of Kiev, of Kiov —

But the train turned away from Kiev, it did not go into the city. It stopped near a huge pine forest. Near an immense camp, which swarmed already with a similarly torn and battered army of prisoners.

"That's Darnitza — "

This information was also imparted by Szivacsek. They would remain here for a few days, they would be distributed from here. From here they would go to their final destination. That was what Szivacsek said.

There were a few brick buildings in the camp, for the officers. The privates were sent to frame barracks.

He loitered aimlessly among the pines of Darnitza. The forest looked like an amusement park in the slums: noise and yells and men lying on the grass and dirt beneath the beautiful trees and filthy men.

The frame barracks were half buried in the ground. He went into one. Three rows of shelves against the walls. The men slept on them. But there was not enough room for all of them and they had to lie close to each other. Like cigars in a box. That was where they slept and those who came late had no place to sleep at all. They had to sleep in the open. Although there were many who voluntarily went out to sleep in the open, despite the fact that they had places inside, so unbearable was the air in the barracks sunk into the ground. And then again, it was comparatively healthy to sleep out there, in the sand, there were no bugs out there, no disease.

There was a large crowd in front of one of the barracks. Two smooth-shaven men were busy before a small kitchen stove. Hundreds of men crowded around the fire and tried to shove each other out of the way. He was told that two actor-fellows were running a sort of restaurant there, they cooked meat and pancakes and sold them to the prisoners.

"Who are they? Russians?"

"Oh, no. Actors from Budapest. Don't you know them? That's Mr. Sárossy, from the Király Theater — from Budapest."

Near Kiev, in a pine forest called Darnitza, a Mr. Sárossy, from the Király, was sweating before a kitchen stove, frying pancakes, exhibiting tricks.

He threw the cakes up in the air and then neatly caught them in the pan. That was how he turned them over. Around him grinned the shipwrecks of the Battle of Lutsk and the horn of a river-boat, floating on the Dnieper, was heard from afar.

A counterfeit cornet, whose promotion had not been mentioned in the orders of the day, was standing close to a worried second lieutenant who was not sure of his exoneration; and electric bulbs were loudly announcing the latest news in the huge show-window next to the Café New York; and some one in the Avas was hurrying to the station to catch the last train; and a little reporter was running over to Buda to find out all about a chimney-fire; and a general with brilliant shoulder-straps was suggesting that the immense masses of prisoners should be exhibited to the populace of Moscow on the Tverskaya; and an innkeeper near Verdun was buying a stolen cow; and a man in Alsace was refusing to buy German war-bonds; and the latest fashion was already on display in Petöfi Street; and an airplane was shot down above Kol-Malin; and a Russian artillerist found some papers at the edge of the Swamp of Rokitno; and a major somewhere said: Guess my rheumatism is getting better; and a colonel telephoned: Hold out to the last man; and First Lieutenant Beregi fired into a sergeant because the sergeant talked back; and unlucky fathers ecstatically watched Mr. Sárossy turning over pancakes trickily in the air near Kiev....

CHAPTER XXV

HE ambled back to the brick building, to the officers' quarters. Here, too: confusion and building acquaintances and crowds and cleansing and tea. But there was also a respectfully listening group around a colonel. There was no order as yet, they mixed freely and without discrimination, but the officers of high rank had already their courts. The others spoke in low tones there, they listened watchfully to the speakers. They shot reproachful glances at a black-haired cornet who cursed because he could not get any warm water. He cautiously stole nearer to the group and, standing on his toes, watched what was going on.

There were low and wide wooden benches along the walls. A colonel was sitting there, lecturing to the group around him.

He said that the Czechs could not be blamed for everything. Nobody could conscientiously claim that the front had been broken through just because the Czechs had surrendered at the flank. True, hundreds of thousands had been captured, but the reason for this was the exaggerated humanitarianism of the Highest Command. They had wanted to protect and to save the troops, that was why they had ordered the fox-holes to be built, and when the Russians had charged everybody had been in the fox-holes. The colonel said that he wished not to criticize the Highest Command, but, nevertheless, this exaggerated solicitude had reacted unfavorably. He himself had been out inspecting the first-line trenches when drumfire had begun and, since he could not have returned, he had stayed in the fox-holes. He had been captured just like the others: a Russian delegate had appeared in the fox-holes with a white handkerchief in his hand and had informed them that they had been captured. They had not surrendered themselves, but they could not have resisted because there had been a Russian machine gun trained at them. In military language, this had not been a capitulation, they had merely abandoned useless resistance. He would draw up his deposition accordingly, said the colonel. He would submit a report of his experiences to the General Staff, after his return home, of course, and he would take a strong position against the use of these fox-holes. "It is comforting to know," concluded the colonel, "that these great masses of prisoners are not the result of a defeat. It would be indeed very sad if the Russians had been able to disarm so many of our soldiers at once. But they withdrew from our soldiers the possibility of resistance, consequently, the fault lies not in our unwillingness to fight, for, if it were so, the future would indeed be dark. It was merely a tactical error which could be easily remedied — "

The colonel always emphasized the phrase, "they withdrew the possibility of resistance from us." It was clear that he was very proud of the formula which he himself had invented, he repeated it several times, with great gusto. He must have thought that history would record the name of the colonel who first used that expression.

The colonel now remarked that he would like to rest, whereupon all officers stiffened into "at attention." Those who wore caps saluted, those who were bareheaded, bowed, but all left him immediately. Now the colonel said: "Pardon me, gentlemen, pardon me, one more second —"

All came back and respectfully waited for him to speak. The colonel said, "Gentlemen, my aide has disappeared and I am in need of an aide now. But I have to inform you right now that in case he shows up the new aide will be relieved. Perhaps First Lieutenant Pépey —"

First Lieutenant Pépey stepped forward. He was obviously happy that the colonel selected him. Immediately he stepped to the colonel's side, who continued to talk and said that since, to the best of his knowledge, he was the highest ranking officer in the camp, he would take over the command. First Lieutenant Pépey will look around and ascertain whether this is true, and if there is some one of a higher rank, he will report it immediately. To-morrow afternoon at two o'clock there will be an officers' meeting on the clearing just beyond the last barrack to the east; he will have to issue several orders, lay down regulations. And now, good night, gentlemen. First Lieutenant Pépey will, of course, have to pick an orderly for himself.

They saluted again, then they were dismissed. He sauntered around in the rooms. All were full of officers. Most of them were cornets. In one of the rooms he surprised a number of aspirants sewing the insignia of the cornets on their collars. Here was the cornet-factory. All of them knew already that aspirants would get no fifty rubles, would not be detailed to an officers' camp, would have to work. Amazing, how quickly the information spread. He felt like an old, veteran cornet among them, he was a senior cornet, he was ahead of them in the active list, he had been a cornet since yesterday.

And where had they picked up so quickly all these tin teacups, where the sugar, where the hot water? How quickly they settled down, how much at home they already felt! He remembered his chocolate. He broke off a piece and offered it to an unknown second lieutenant. They introduced themselves to each other and he got a cup of tea; but you will have to get the sugar yourself, said the second lieutenant, smiling. No, I never put sugar in my tea, only at home. They had to laugh now: that was regarded as a joke. They laughed and he drank his tea, without sugar. It was very good, he was thirsty. The second lieutenant remarked that there was place for him on his shelf and asked him to stay there. Lie down, if you are sleepy. He was sleepy, but he could not fall asleep; and more faces came into the room. He knew already that he would sleep here, next to this Austrian second lieutenant, he saw already that the "cigar-system" was in use here, too, they would have to sleep next to each other on the shelves. But he did not want to fall asleep as yet. He was looking for acquaintances among the men who came into the room. He had lost Lányi, and Szivacsek, too, and now here was this Austrian second lieutenant, he was a namesake of a well-known German author: Stefan Zweig. Well, if he isn't in captivity now, he will be most probably writing a review. Scandalous, how dares such a female call herself an actress? Or, isn't that Stefan Zweig a dramatic critic?

Well, and who now, instead of him, smoked a cigar in front of Hangli's? Who was now, in his stead, criticizing Porzsolt's column, who was reading the pleasant Pesti Futár? He wondered whether his substitute enjoyed it as much as he would, whether his substitute knew how to order correctly the coffee at the Café New York, whether he gazed at the show-windows for him, whether he was anxious for his job. Because, as a matter of fact, that went with liberty and freedom. If there was justice in the world, his substitute would have to worry now about unemployment —

In his dream, on the shelf, he was talking to his wife: "Dear, I couldn't tell you the truth, but, as you see, everything's turned out all right; you see, I've attended to it very well. How is sonny?"

He received no reply because he was awakened, and he saw Russian soldiers in the room, with flashlights.

The translator announced that a few officers would have to come with them. A committee was to question them. He looked at his watch, it was past midnight, the whole building was asleep, and, hell, couldn't they have thought of it before? What did they want? And why did they pick him?

They picked him because the Russians picked them out at random. But if he did not want to go, he could stay, they said, they would then take some one else.

The others woke up, too, and some of them said: Don't go unless you are forced to, who knows what they are after, what military secrets they want to get out of you?

In that case, he said, it would be best if he went, because he knew no military secrets at all.

But, his comrades said, he would first have to get permission from his superior officer, it would be best to ask the colonel about it, to find out what his opinion, or rather, command, was.

He would report the matter to him afterwards, he told them. He rose, and left the room surrounded by Russian soldiers with fixed bayonets. They took him downstairs, to a brightly illuminated room on the ground floor.

Crimson-collared, beribboned, bearded Russian generals with golden shoulder-straps — they must be generals, at least! — were sitting behind a long table. Huge chandeliers hung from the ceiling, and the uniforms, the epaulets, the medals on their chests, shone brilliantly in the glaring light.

A Turgeniev novel floated silently toward him, the characters of Tolstoy's "Anna Karenina" rose dimly in the distance, from Dostoievsky, the soldier Karamazov's hazy figure appeared before his eyes, and Pushkin sang from above —

If he could only step before them and open his heart to them and say:

"Have you any idea, right honorable gentlemen, how deeply I love the Russian soil? — General Pavel Pavlovitch, I know Turgeniev, I know Gogol, I know Lermontov, Gorky is a good friend of mine and Sonia, who accompanied the murderer to Siberia, will be my inseparable sister forever — I hope, gentlemen — " And then he would deeply bow and bend his knee in token of his respect and admiration, and the Russian officers would leap to their feet and embrace him and the presiding general would kiss him, just as it so often happened in Russian novels — He would bring up Chekhov, he would bring up Oblomov. He would place before them his overwhelmed and happily bleeding heart —

"So you are willing to give us information concerning certain military questions?" asked the translator.

He had never in his life been awakened from a more beautiful dream more rudely.

"No — no — of course not," he stammered. "I am an officer, my oath binds me — But — but — how could I express it — I am a great admirer of Russian literature — "

"Is this all you want to say?"

"No — as a matter of fact — I don't want — anything — not even that — All this is like a Dostoievsky novel — like a Tolstoy book — "

The translator beckoned to a guard who, with fixed bayonet, took him back to his place on the shelf, next to Stefan Zweig, who was already loudly snoring.

CHAPTER XXVI

THERE was no officers' meeting the next afternoon. New transports had arrived in the morning and, toward noon, the news spread that the frame sheds as well as the brick building were crowded to overflowing. A transport was to start in the afternoon, for Moscow.

Moscow, Holy City of all the Russias.

It felt good, to tie, with this slender rope of a sentence, the storm-ridden canoe of one's life to pleasant old memories — Even though it was nothing but a sentence —

"Ah, Mr. Cornet!"

Captain Kenéz was standing before him, the same captain to whom he had been unable to deliver the fresh rolls and the salami, because of unforeseen and annoying circumstances.

The captain looked at him very severely and it was evident that his "Mr. Cornet" had been meant sarcastically.

His momentary joy froze on his face and, involuntarily, he clicked his heels together.

"Well!" said the captain. "Don't go away now. Stay here. Lieutenant Hoffmann, my aide, will be here presently and then he will escort you to rapport."

They waited for Lieutenant Hoffmann. When he arrived, he stepped up to him, saluted in the most correct fashion, and said:

"I am commanded to escort the aspirant to rapport."

The reservist Lieutenant Hoffmann apparently did not say the formula according to Regulations, for Captain Kenéz shook his head disapprovingly and remarked:

"Well, well, Lieutenant —"

They started to go. He with Lieutenant Hoffmann, Captain Kenéz a few steps ahead of them. The captain looked into every room. But they did not stop in any of them. He even looked into the washroom. But he did not go in. It seemed he looked for a quieter place, where no one would disturb them. They left the building, turned, in the woods, toward the frame sheds, and at last came to a stop beneath a huge pine.

Lieutenant Hoffmann stepped to the captain and reported to him that he had escorted the aspirant to rapport. Both he and Lieutenant Hoffmann saluted, and Captain Kenéz returned their salute. Then the rapport began.

A few steps from them, a ragged and desperate army of miserables, above them, twittering birds. From the Dnieper came again the tooting of the river-boat's horn, from the direction of Sárossy's barrack floated the smells of melted butter and of roasted meat. His feet were swollen into the shoes, his shirt was sticky with a week's filth, his eyes bloodshot, he stood there rigidly, stiffened into "at attention," with a bread-bag dangling at his side, and the rapport began:

"First of all, who permitted you to wear the insignia of a cornet?"

"A Russian officer permitted it, but I don't know his name. And others have also sewed on the insignia, everybody promoted himself, even some of the volunteers — "

"Nobody in my battalion may sew them on without my permission. I alone may give permissions in the hope of future confirmation of such promotions. But we will talk about that later. What's happened to the mess-money?"

"What mess-money?"

"Aspirant was in charge of the mess. Aspirant went to Budapest to buy supplies. How much was left over?"

"I beg to report, Captain, I spent almost all of the money. I rendered a full account of the money expended and I gave whatever was left to the quartermaster — "

A dreamy look came into the captain's eyes. He stared into the distance, as if he had suddenly discovered the futility of everything. As if the war itself had lost all its significance to him. Then he waved the little rod he held in his hand.

"Dismissed, Lieutenant Hoffmann. You'd better learn a little military demeanor and behavior in captivity — You're dismissed too, Cornet — It was a damn foolish thing to give that money back to the quartermaster, there would have been plenty of time to do it after the war — "

The captain stood there sadly broken and suddenly aged, it was as if he had collapsed. He pitied him.

He stepped nearer to him.

"If you please, Captain," he said in a lax, incorrect, civilian manner, "if you will permit me — "

"What is it, Cornet?"

"You need some money, don't you?"

"Sure I do. I thought you had some of the mess-money still with you. I would have taken upon myself the responsibility of delivering it to the proper authorities — But if there isn't any — "

"There is no mess-money. But I had been paid just before I was captured. I can give you some. Can you use it here?"

"Thank you ever so much, my son. Certainly I can use it. You do me a very great favor. I'll write to my family to send the money to yours. Can you give me a hundred korona?"

"With pleasure. I can give you two hundred, if you want it. I have seven."

"Why, you're a millionaire! But I don't need more than a hundred. I don't want to burden my family unnecessarily. So we've made peace. But why didn't you report your promotion to me?"

"May I wear my insignia?"

"Why, certainly. As far as I am concerned you may wear anything you please — "

He took out one hundred korona from the little linen bag which hung around his neck under his shirt and gave it to the captain. Then he dictated to him his wife's address where the captain's wife should send the hundred korona.

They were engrossed in a friendly conversation when he suddenly noticed Lieutenant Hoffmann.

"There is your aide, shall I call him?"

"Let him be," said the captain. "I don't need him any more. But I couldn't hold the rapport without him. Now I have a hundred korona, that'll last until we get some money from the Russians. I needed a coat very badly, and a blanket."

"Why, can you buy coats here? and blankets? I need them too."

"Come with me."

He had not seen any coat and blanket shops, although he was very familiar with every nook and corner of the camp. The captain took him to one of the frame sheds.

"We need coats and blankets," he said to the infantrymen.

A hundred of them ran to their places, picked up their coats and blankets, and raced back to them. They outyelled each other:

"Mine is brand-new, sir, mine is black, sir — "

They selected two coats and two blankets and the captain began to bargain, for him, too. Each paid ten korona for both the blanket and the coat.

He held fast to the treasure and enjoyed his sleep in advance; there would be no more safety-razor pillows, no more chocolate pillows for him. He would not be shivering any more, the cold would not wake him up at dawn.

"How is it, Captain, that the men have two coats and two blankets?"

"Why should they have two?"

"Well, if they sell one of them!"

"They have only one, or none at all. Those who have any sell them. They will get others in Penza, or in Moscow, from the Red Cross."

"And what'll they do until that?"

"Just what you did, and I did."

Of course! The blanket quivered under his arm. So — he took it away by the right of money.

"Do they need the money so badly?"

"Say, what did you have for dinner last night? And what for lunch to-day?"

"Chocolate. I've been eating chocolate since they captured me. I had a few tablets with me. Funny, I notice it only now that I've been living on chocolate for days. Yes — "

"You see! Do you think every one had chocolate? Give me a bite."

He took the last tablet out of his bread-bag and gave the captain half of it. The captain raised it to his watering mouth with trembling hands.

"I was about to buy something for myself. But this is much better. There's nothing better than chocolate."

"Tell me, Captain, are you sure they'll get coats in Moscow?"

"Well, if there are any they will."

"And how far is Moscow from here?"

"Well, by express, it's quicker. If we are put on a freight-train, two weeks. Or four — "

Two weeks, or four — And blankets only if there should be any —

"I am sorry that I've taken the blanket from that man. Although there are many who lose their lives — "

"So you too have discovered that — What else do you want? This is war. And it's only for a couple of days. Incidentally, blankets and coats will be dearer to-morrow — if there are any at all — "

"What do you mean, dearer?"

"Yes. We'll get food to-morrow. I heard it just now. Here, and on the train also. It's all settled. If you had waited another day, you'd have paid a lot for the blanket."

For a piece of bread! The soldier had to choose between starvation and his last blanket. He had arrived at the last moment. Sale! Last day to-day! Great! He had taken advantage of the opportunity. It would be a good idea to buy blankets to-day. A sure investment. Even the contractors who delivered paper-soled boots to the Army were more honest than — No? Why, certainly! Some one had to go to the dogs. He was successful, he hadn't gone. The captain was successful, too. And the quartermaster also. Indeed, from the quartermaster's point of view, even the attack, the battle, were successful. Well, what of it! And at home they sing ballads of the soldiers!

CHAPTER XXVII

CAPTAIN KENEZ proved to be a bad prophet. An ear-splitting noise was suddenly heard from the direction of the brick building and the prisoners, all of them at once, made a mad rush for the building.

The news that food was being distributed spread rapidly. Not to-morrow, to-day. And at once, right away, to everybody. A long freight train was standing on the track in front of the brick building. They were to entrain immediately after the feast. And the feast would take place to-day, not to-morrow.

It was a lucky investment, this buying of blankets. There were no blankets for sale now, there were none to be had for love or money. Those who had bought blankets speculated wisely. Blankets and coats: firm. On the Darnitza Exchange, the blanket market grew firmer. Quotations on blankets had a strong upward trend. Szacelláry was buying oats on the Budapest Exchange. Rifles and munitions also improved in Budapest. It was possible that some one sold rifles before they reached a new high. Two infantrymen in the Forest of Darnitza sold blankets and coats too soon. They speculated stupidly. They went bankrupt. They would not sleep to-night. In Budapest, the losers did not sleep either.

The food was brought in huge iron stew-pots. The officers ate in the brick building.

The stew-pot was put down, and an elderly Red Cross sister, with a ladle, took a position next to it. She stood there as if she wanted to accompany the dealing out of the first food on Russian soil with an impressive ceremony. As if she wanted to deliver a speech. As if she wanted to inaugurate the captive troops of the Central Powers into the ownership of the mush.

The men stood, for a second, in reverential silence. Then a soldier took off his cap and greedily ladled out a capful of mush. There was no chance now for ceremonies, or sentiments, or, even, order. Every soldier grabbed as much as he could. One man attacked the mush with his bare hands; he collapsed a few minutes later, the boiling mush burned frightful wounds on his hands. They ate it from newspapers, towels, handkerchiefs. There was no time to hurry for the mess-tins, provided they had any. The stew-pot was empty in no time. A second one was brought, but there was no way of knowing whether there would be a third one, too, or a fourth. The men shoved, kicked, and tore each other, they fought and hit each other, these comrades.

He wondered whether there was any mush left in the officers' stew-pot.

With chocolate in his stomach, he now began to long for a little mush. He was not hungry — not hungry — But a little mush! — Boiled, hot mush! —

He went to the brick building and looked into the first stew-pot.

The officers' pot did not contain mush. There was laska in it, laska with pot cheese. God, if this pot cheese is only made of sheep-milk! — But how could one know how the Russians liked their laska? If there was a God in heaven, this was made of sheep-milk; and he stepped nearer to the kettle. He did not know just how he could get some for himself, he had no mess-tin or pan or anything, but he wanted to have some of it just the same. A tall yager politely pushed him aside and asked him what he wanted.

"I'd like — some of the laska —"

The yager grimly replied that he could not have any of this. Not of this laska. This laska was reserved for staff officers only. From majors up. There were other stew-pots for the subalterns. The yager advised him to repair to one of those.

He stole over to the subalterns' laska, cautiously watching the ranks. He noticed that Captain Kenéz had already eaten. At last he reached a pot surrounded only by aspirants and cornets. These were also noisy, also rough, but, at least, they did not kick each other. He saluted the sister who asked where she should put his laska.

He held out his blanket to her, he said, he showed, he signaled that she should just put it on the hairy blanket. The sister gave him a big ladleful.

Alas, the laska was sweet. It was sugared. And the pot cheese was just ordinary pot cheese. There were raisins in it. There were two raisins in the ladleful of laska. After chocolate, laska prepared with pot cheese made out of sheep-milk would have been much better. But it was not bad this way, either. It was fine, as a matter of fact. He immediately decided to ask his wife to make it once for him, when he got home —

Too bad that he could not mop up the dish. Then he looked around. The prisoners had dispersed. The stew-pots and the sisters had disappeared. But the camp still buzzed with excitement. A detachment of Russian soldiers arrived, with fixed bayonets.

A search was to take place now. After that, the train for Moscow. The prisoners were asked voluntarily to submit their revolvers, cameras, cartridges. This was their last chance. Anything found later on would bring trouble upon the owner's head. Field-glasses also.

The Russians spread out huge sheets on the ground and asked the officers to throw the requisitioned articles into them. They were not searched. The ranks were. The officers were merely requested to surrender their belongings on their word of honor. But if anything should be found on an officer, he would be immediately deprived of his commission and demoted, for breaking the officers' word of honor. And he would be punished, to boot.

He thought it was asinine to make such a request. Who had any revolvers now? or cameras?

He was mistaken. Piles of field-glasses, of revolvers, of cameras were collected. And cartridges, too.

And, at the same time, a small group near by almost decided to save a revolver —

He had heard that officers had died for their swords. Yes, a symbol. But what did a revolver stand for? What good might one revolver do?

Late in the afternoon, they were, at last, in the freight cars. Of course, he had been the last to get into his car and he did not know who his car-mates were, where to sit, where to stand. Then he discovered Lányi. Second Lieutenant Lányi. Quite by accident. Second Lieutenant Lányi was very happy to have found him, he had been looking for him all day long. Because of the deposition. He was the commander of this car. Car-commander Lányi. Szivacsek was there, too. The deposition was ready, they merely had to sign it. Lányi had made inquiries, according to the authorities he had to sign his old rank. The rank the orders of the day had mentioned did not count, not until after the rehabilitation at home. He was car-commander, Lányi said, as a matter of fact he should have reported himself to him. He wouldn't do anything about it, however. Most probably he hadn't known it.

The car was a smart ox-car, said Lányi, but that was all right also.

There were shelves in the car which divided it into a lower and an upper part. Here they would sleep, lying next to each other. Six below, six above, on the other side also, six below, six above. That was twenty-four. Six men would be on guard duty, they would not sleep. Thus the thirty of them would have enough place.

"Russians won't guard us?"

"Yes, they will, two Russians will come into every car. But we must have our own guard also, that's the command. Anyway, everybody will have a chance to sleep, because the guard will be relieved. Every one of us will be on guard duty."

In his "compartment," a board was missing from the shelf. When they stretched themselves out their legs hung down. The bed ended at their knees. They needed one more board. The "compartment" ought to have been lengthened.

On the track next to theirs there waited another train. That was for the ranks. Car-commander Lányi asked the soldiers in the car opposite theirs:

"Have you got a spare board, comrades?"

"Sure we have. But we won't give it to you."

"Why not?"

"Because after laska it will be all right for you as it is. After mush, however, we've got to rest."

"There's no more discipline in the troops," remarked Lányi. "The way they talk back to a lieutenant — "

But they did not start yet. Something had happened. A Russian detachment went from car to car and looked into every one of them. They searched the cars rather thoroughly. They did that because a cornet had picked an argument with a Czech soldier and had called him names. He had accused the Czechs of cowardice, he had said that the disaster could have been avoided if the Czechs had not surrendered. The Czech soldiers had denounced him and now the Russians were looking for the cornet. The Czech led them. Finally the Czech gave up the search. Let him be. Later the news spread that the Czech had been afraid to come along with the prisoners and had joined the Czech Legion. By the time this news reached his car, the train was already rolling. The prisoners' train was slowly rolling toward Moscow.

Two Russian soldiers guarded them. Both wore long beards. They seemed to be veteran soldiers, and both were very severe. They would not let the prisoners go to the door. And the car had no windows. And it would have been so beautiful to look out at Gorky's country, at Gogol's land. He could only now and then steal a glance at the villages where the mujiks lived, the small towns where Russian noblemen visited each other in winter, the roads where troikas raced in Russian novels, the fields where Prince Vronsky's cattle grazed, the gardens where Goncharov had dreamed once upon a time, the river on the bank of which Malva had rested —

He could not even look out while the train was in motion, the two guards locked the doors. They could gaze at Russia only when the train was at a station. Szivacsek tried to persuade the guards in Russian but his efforts were in vain, the guards would not even answer him. Especially the older one was very angry and severe.

He fell asleep at last. Everybody had already fallen asleep. Even their own guard. Their own guard differed from the rest of them in that they slept on the floor and not on the shelves. He also slept on the floor because his shelf was too short. But the guard was not relieved at night. No one invited him to guard duty.

He spread the blanket on the floor and covered himself with the coat. But he had been mistaken when he had thought that the safety razor would no longer serve as his pillow. It was his pillow and he slept peacefully until morning and, in his dream, he had a pleasant chat with the General Staff, with the Russian General Staff. At last he was permitted to tell them that he had always followed the case of Ivan Matveievitch with great interest, that Oblomov's affair was of great importance to him, that he had always felt sorry for poor Olga Sergeievna, and that —

CHAPTER XXVIII

THE stations had beautiful, romantic names: Berdichev — Thula — The train stopped everywhere for hours.

At last, hopefully and excitedly, they heard that the next stop would be Moscow. Moskva. One could not tell just what they expected of Moscow, but they did expect something. A change, perhaps. Already a signpost came into sight. That was the first disappointment. Until now, the fact that the names of the cities were written in Cyrillic letters had not struck him as peculiar. There had been something strange, something extraordinary in those Cyrillic letters. Here, however, when he read the sign Mockba, it was disillusioning, it was almost painfully unpleasant. Of course, he knew that it should have read Moskva, yet it was comical, annoying — Mockba — Mockba — It seemed to him precisely as if a well-dressed gentleman in evening clothes had appeared with an old-fashioned woman's hat on his head at a ball.

Captain Kenéz had been right, the journey had taken fourteen days. It would have been quicker by express train. The last day, however, was more pleasant than the previous ones. Until that day, the guards had been extremely severe. They had not permitted them to leave the wagon without supervision, had forbidden them to open the doors save for a very narrow slit through which they could hardly peek out.

They enjoyed a little freedom on the last day, however. He was responsible for it.

He awoke unusually early on the last day. He opened his eyes lazily, and only a little, and then he saw something strange. The older soldier, the smarter, the more disciplined, the angrier of the two, was also awake. He watched the Russian cautiously. The guard looked around and when he saw that all were asleep, the prisoners as well as his companion, he took, with a deep and heavy sigh, a small bag out of his bread-sack. He opened the small bag and took Jewish prayer-straps out of it — leather prayer-straps — sighed again — looked around cautiously again — then stealthily wound the straps around his arms and forehead. It took but a few minutes, the Jew was already hastily tearing the straps off his arms and forehead, when he mercilessly spoke to him, in German:

"Sie, Jude!"

The old soldier very nearly collapsed of fright. Tears were hiding in his eyes.

He reproved him. Quietly, without harshness, instructively. Aren't you ashamed of yourself? Why were you so severe to us?

The poor Jew kept silent. Once he wanted to interrupt him, but he would not let him:

"Schweigen!" he said loudly.

This frightened the Czar's poor old Jew, he was afraid that some one would find out his secret. He begged him with his eyes, like a beaten dog, not to betray him, not to give away his secret.

He told the poor Jew that if he would not behave decently he would tell everybody that he was a Jew. And then no one would respect him. The tortured Russian nodded and tried to exonerate himself. He said, quietly and with downcast eyes, that if his colleague had found out that he was a Jew he would have refused to obey him. Let alone the officers! Had they known it — why, they might have escaped. And he was responsible for them. If one escaped, he would be sent to the front at once. This way, however, there was a chance that he might hang around in the hinterland for several months more. Provided he was satisfactory as a guard.

He did not betray to any one their mutual secret, but from that moment on, he merely had to wink and the Jew obeyed him. When they reached a station, he ordered him to open the doors. He assured him that nobody would escape. At noon, he took up a collection among the prisoners and collected a ruble for each of the guards. When he handed the money to them, he told them that they would have gotten a ruble every day had they behaved more decently.

The two Russian soldiers were downhearted, they were sad that they had lost this income, their hearts ached because this was the last day and the easy money had been lost forever. They sighed and embarrassedly played with their beards.

They did not go into Moscow. The train turned away from it just as the train of their life had been turning away from everything these past years. It was now running on a side-track, just as all the peoples of the earth had been side-tracked for years. The side-track led to a camp of Red Cross buildings. They got out there, they were told that they would stay there for several days. When they got off, the two Russian soldiers, the Jew and the Moslem, took leave of them amidst tears and repeated expressions of regret, the Moslem even said that it was possible that they might never, never again meet, never again in this life.

He cried bitterly, and he shook his head as if he had been praying, his tears flowed freely — as if the thought of never meeting again was utterly terrible.

He was constantly annoyed, during their stay in Moscow, by that peculiar name. He could not forget it. What a disappointment. Now everything that he had drawn for himself, in such fine, beautiful lines, everything that he had been longing for so reverentially all his life, everything had become — well, full of typographical errors. Grotesque. As if some one had wickedly printed below the picture he had painted of Moscow: Mockba. He tried to read it differently. No, it was impossible. He had lost forever and for good Moscow, Moskva, the Holy City —

Instead of the romantic Moskva, he got a city of frame barracks teeming with prisoners of war and mysterious, busy Red Cross sisters. The sisters pretended to be extremely busy. He did not know whether they were sweating day-laborers of mercy or princesses. They did not know. The sisters gave them something to eat and hurriedly distributed some underwear. They told them they might write home. On special postal cards, "for prisoners only." The sisters distributed those, too.

He made new friends, besides Lányi and Szivacsek. The bespectacled Kajaba, for instance, and little Tánczos.

"How did you get here? Why, you aren't of age yet!"

"I am seventeen. I joined up as a volunteer for the duration of the war. I also wanted to do my duty — "

Little Tánczos enjoyed separately every piece of underwear he got and called every officer above twenty "Uncle." He was very frightened about his rank, he had been only a volunteer-corporal before he had been captured, and now he begged him several times not to betray him to any one.

He felt sorry that this young boy, who said that it had been his duty, was also in it. He saw only one man who still wore the stripes of the aspirants. He must have been in his middle thirties. It struck him as peculiar that no one had said anything to this poor fellow about his rank. His name was Novák, he washed his underwear and shirt modestly separated from the rest of them, he did not discuss with them their great plans. He was working on a book, or something, whenever he had a moment to himself. Whenever there was a chance, he sat down and wrote, page after page.

He went up to him.

"Tell me, do you intend to stay like this, an aspirant?"

"Yes, I do."

"And if it's true that you'll be sent to a camp for the ranks?"

"Well, I'll be sent to where I belong. I can't cheat."

"Why not? Why can't you? If everybody else — "

"I cannot. I am a government employee at home, that's why. I am with the Treasury Division at Nagykároly, and I know how these things are entered in budgets, how precisely. I can't risk my job — "

"You mean, your job at home?"

"Yes, my job at home. If they find it out, they'll fire me at once. I can't take the risk."

"And what are you writing all day long?"

"A play."

You don't say so. Sándor Novák, prisoner of war, clerk in the Treasury Division at Nagykároly, writing a play in Mockba. And he would not risk his job at home. He was taking great care of his reputation.

"Do you want to present it here? at the Moscow Art Theater? or at the Czar's Opera? Where?"

"All right, joke. But tell me, what do you think, how long are we going to be here? in Russia?"

Of course. How long? He had never thought of that. Well, my God, until Christmas. At the most, until Easter. Perhaps. Until Easter. And then he would be telling to old Kathe, their cook: You know, when the buglers sounded the last taps, meaning that the war was over, all along the lines, in all the trenches, on both sides, the soldiers raised white flags and jumped out of the trenches, and met halfway between the lines, and shook hands — Or wouldn't it be this way?

"Well, what do you think? What's your opinion, Sándor?"

"If you want to know it: I am satisfied if it won't take more than three years. Furthermore, I am of the opinion that we will sit down somewhere and we will be frightfully, excruciatingly bored. There won't be any wine, there won't be any women, nor books, nor any amusement. We'll have to scratch something out of the earth, if we don't want to go mad. That's what I think. And then I'll come with my insignificant rank and I'll read to you the play. And I'll read to you the novel, too, and the short stories I am working on. Because I am writing novels, too. And you'll beg me to do something for you. And then I'll make a theater for you. We'll study the parts and present the play and you'll all be happy. You'll see — "

Happy author! He will take the World War by its horns and force it to give him a chance to see his play acted!

"And what's the title of your play?"

" 'The Lawyer.' By Ferenc Molnár."

"Of course not. It's by Molnár. Don't you know 'The Lawyer'? I also have a short story by Heltai. I am working on it now. I write down what I still remember of it. That's how I wrote the play. I have to hurry. Thank God, I can still remember them, very clearly. But later on, I may not be able to remember anything. For the time being I have these, but I hope I'll be able to put together a couple more things."

From afar, the tower of the Kremlin hove in sight and all of a sudden he felt the Holy City distinctly and exhilaratingly. And Mr. Novák also, of the Treasury Division, who was feverishly working, on the bank of the Moskva, on Ferenc Molnár's comedy entitled "The Lawyer" and on Heltai's humorous short story. It was a solemn and sacred moment, and he stared at the clerk who did not want to deceive the Treasury but painted sets for a theater of the future, standing in the doorway of an unknown fate, drifting on the waves of an ocean of human, inhuman and eternal struggles.

CHAPTER XXIX

THERE were no coats or blankets distributed. All a prisoner got was two shirts of very poor quality and some thin undershirts. The Russians had begun to pay the allowances already on the way to Moscow, they had not discriminated between aspirant and captain, everybody received fifty rubles. For the time being, the aspirants were regarded as officers. But their own superiors reminded the aspirants that this situation might not be permanent, that perhaps they had been paid by mistake, and warned them to be careful. They might be compelled to pay it back.

Szivacsek, in a close circle of friends, read and translated to them, from the Russian newspapers, the Russian official communiqués. These spoke of huge numbers of prisoners, of fifty thousand officers and one-half million privates and non-coms. There were very many in the camp, and they were ready to give credit to the Russian bulletins. Deep down in their hearts, secretly, they were happy that all had happened thus, they thought the war would be over soon, such losses could not be possibly replaced. But then suddenly, as if to offset their instinctive wish, they broke out angrily and loudly:

"Only those damned fox-holes — God damn the fellow who invented them — That was what ruined us — "

At first, the officers of high rank formed exclusive groups: there were groups for officers from majors up, groups for captains. Then, for no discernible reason, these groups broke up. They seemed to enjoy mixing with their inferiors. At least they acted as if they did. But the friendship lasted for hours only. Then they began to regulate them, to keep them in order. A commandant was absolutely necessary, they said, everything would fall to pieces without commandants. And adjutants were also necessary, and detachment-commanders, and officers' meetings.

These hints soon destroyed all possible chances for making any kind of organization, and as soon as a group noticed an approaching captain or a lieutenant-colonel, it quickly dispersed.

He did not know how but he did fish out for himself an officers' meeting. There were thirty in the room in which he was and there was a pleasant but smart and strict first lieutenant with them. Koltár was his name. He talked so much to them that finally they adopted various regulations. They decided to nominate a man to watch their belongings, one to look out for cigarettes, meals and possible other things to be distributed by the Russians, one to look after the mailing of postal cards. These were relieved every hour. Those missing from the room for more than two hours were looked after. Szivacsek was appointed reader and announcer, he was to take care of proper ventilation. First Lieutenant Koltár requested them to report to him everything out of the ordinary. In the afternoon, some one reported to him something, in the evening, all of them reported to him, standing rigidly "at attention," saluting correctly, and Koltár was no longer requesting anything. He was commanding already. Just as at home, in the barracks. Before they went to bed, the adjutant read to them the orders of the day — Koltár organized them so thoroughly that he was already issuing orders of the day, and he ordered them to gather at nine o'clock the following morning. For an officers' meeting.

The officers' meeting was correctly held the next morning. Not one of them objected to it, not one of them found it queer, all of them stood rigidly according to Regulations, and they stood "at ease" only when First Lieutenant Koltár, after the adjutant had reported to him the number of officers present, requested them to "stand comfortably, gentlemen."

First Lieutenant Koltár then rendered an account of what had happened so far, announcing that he would take good care of the welfare of the group, that he would do everything in his power to learn of possible allotments in time. He asked them to trust him. Thus, for instance, he had learned already that they were to get two pounds of sugar per man and he had already made arrangements that each and every one of them should get it. For the time being, his efforts to secure coats and blankets had been futile, therefore he requested those gentlemen who had none to be patient. At three in the afternoon everybody should be here, they would go bathing, and he would see to it that all should get their bath. A complaint had reached him that Artillery-Aspirant Simonyi when taking water out of their common water-tank had stuck his hand into the water. Such things are not in accordance with the spirit of comradeship —

Aspirant Simonyi stepped forward.

He was a tall, black young man and he defended himself excitedly.

First Lieutenant Koltár severely informed him that he had no right to speak until he was given permission to do so. He should properly request to be permitted to speak and to defend himself, he did not need to be alarmed, he would not be robbed of the possibility of a defense. But one could not interrupt the commander of an officers' meeting.

Simonyi went even paler and he stammered even more excitedly.

But, at any rate, he snapped himself into "at attention" and begged for permission to present his defense.

First Lieutenant Koltár granted the permission.

Whereupon Simonyi presented his defense. He said that his father was a university professor in Budapest and hence it was inconceivable that he should have done such a thing, he had been brought up differently. He had not stuck his hand in the water. When he had heard that the tank was there for all of them, then he had tied a cord to his flask and he had dipped the flask into the tank. Although dipping a flask into the water was just as unsanitary as sticking one's hand into it, for flasks were just as full of germs as hands, but he had not stuck his hand into the water.

First Lieutenant Koltár declared that, as far as he was concerned, he was satisfied with Aspirant Simonyi's explanation and he hoped that the officers' meeting would join him. Gentlemen, do you accept Aspirant Simonyi's explanation?

The meeting unanimously accepted Simonyi's explanation and thus they tacitly acknowledged First Lieutenant Koltár as their commander. He had now the right to call them to account, to make roll-calls, to order them to vote. Within twenty-four hours, a constitutional monarchy had supplanted the unorganized mob, they had created it themselves, they did not know how but they had a leader now, they had a parliament, they even thought that they had universal suffrage. After the meeting, First Lieutenant Koltár commanded four men to stay in the room, two to look after the officers' belongings, and two to watch out for possible distributions of food or something else. The others might leave, but the guards would be relieved in two hours.

He learned that there were officers' meetings in the neighboring rooms, and also in the other barracks. There were rooms where the meetings had already taken place last night. Yes, no doubt, it was necessary to have some sort of order, otherwise everything would be topsy-turvy, and if we had to have commanders, it was better to have our own men than Russians. But it was queer that they should have thought of it everywhere at the same time, it was queer that the sugar was mentioned everywhere, and that all the room-commanders and all the group-commanders knew of the bath, too. There was some one in every room who voluntarily took over the task of worrying for the rest.

The sugar-story was true. First Lieutenant Koltár left with two men to fetch it and it was interesting to see that the Russians did not distribute it individually but to groups only. No doubt, it was comfortable to have some one go after the things. But they had lost direct contact with the distributing stations. First Lieutenant Koltár told them that he would do everything in his power to take good care of them but if any one of them did not like it here, he might go to another room or to another group, he advised them to think this over now, because this group would be a model group, and he hoped that the comrades would not tolerate a disorderly person among themselves. No one moved and First Lieutenant Koltár said he was very glad to see that all decided to adhere to order and that all honestly and voluntarily shouldered the responsibility of discipline and order. In the afternoon, some of them already proudly boasted to officers of other rooms that they had picked a very smart room-commandant.

First Lieutenant Koltár called another officers' meeting in the afternoon and, after bathing, they all gathered around him. The question on the floor was a command from the Russians ordering the camp to form smaller groups. A group of seventy-five men was to go to the Province of Kostroma, a very healthy region on the banks of the river Undsa, a tributary of the Volga. The name of the town was Makariev.

Seventy-five men, under the command of First Lieutenant Koltár, were to go to Makariev. They did not see the Russian order, they did not know whether the Russian command said anything about First Lieutenant Koltár, but First Lieutenant Koltár declared that only those should join his group whose intentions were honest. The intentions of all of them were honest, consequently they all joined First Lieutenant Koltár's group, but there were only thirty of them altogether, and they needed more men. First lieutenants also joined their group, among them was one Matolcsy, a regular, and one Kömives, a reservist, a professor at a provincial Gymnasium. From among the old acquaintances, Lányi and Szivacsek joined the group.

First Lieutenant Koltár announced that the group was entitled to take along five orderlies. Second Lieutenant Sándor Papp begged permission to bring along his brother, who was a private, as one of the five orderlies. They did not need to worry, he assured them, his brother would carefully attend to all duties. If the meeting had nothing against it, Second Lieutenant Papp's brother would be one of the five men.

All acquiesced and thus Second Lieutenant Papp's brother came with them, because of this touching exhibition of brotherly love.

True, Lieutenant Papp's brother behaved very modestly, nevertheless, several men began complaining even before the group started. They said that he waited on Second Lieutenant Papp only and did not care for the others. As a matter of fact, he was always around his brother, and while Second Lieutenant Papp was eating his dinner, sitting on blankets on the floor, his orderly brother stood at his side and humbly attended to his every wish. Some of them said that Second Lieutenant Papp did all this in order to demonstrate that he expected no special treatment for his brother, but others contended that he exaggerated it.

Second Lieutenant Papp had just finished a big piece of buttered bread and his brother was already giving him another slice, when Second Lieutenant Papp graciously waved it aside and said:

"You may eat it, I don't want it. But first bring me a cup of tea."

The orderly Papp obediently darted away to fetch tea for his brother....

CHAPTER XXX

"ALL aboard for Makariev! Track Number Three!" shouted the boys the next morning. They did not travel in freight cars now, everybody got a seat, and First Lieutenant Koltár, smiling mysteriously, asked them:

"I hope you are satisfied?"

They were very satisfied and they did not stop to find out just what rôle First Lieutenant Koltár had played in securing for them these cars. It was true, however, that they had bathed several times these past days, that they had punctually received their money, that there had been enough sugar, some underwear, and that this third-class car with its wooden benches promised real comfort for the journey. They were permitted to write home and First Lieutenant Koltár said that he would see to it that the mail should be actually forwarded. He too wrote home — and he wrote his letter in German, because they were allowed to write in that language only — and he told that Ich bin in Gefangenschaft geraten. First Lieutenant Koltár guaranteed that by the time they arrived in Makariev they would already have the answers; there was excellent connection with the Central Powers through Finland and Holland. They settled in a car and everybody gave up one kopeck daily, for the guards, that they should make no silly regulations and should let them ramble about at the stations, that they should not be always at their heels. First Lieutenant Koltár guaranteed that no one would escape. This trip was an unforgettable experience. All the characters of Russian novels as they had lived in their subconscious imagination paraded before their eyes, as if in the finale of a colorful romantic operetta: a long-bearded Russian priest rocked a baby in his arms, long-haired mujiks in multicolored shirts drank hot tea. When they reached Ivanovo, a band was playing at the station.

A military band was playing at the station of Ivanovo, replacement troops were going to the front.

Soldiers with flowers in the muzzles of their rifles took leave of their families and, just as at that small-town station in Hungary, one could clearly see who were going to the front and who were the slackers. One could immediately find the concert-director, and he tried to find Jeges, too, and himself, and the three little girls, and he found them. These were no longer the old characters, these had come from a new novel. He did not understand Russian yet he understood and knew everything, he saw clearly what was happening. The train carrying the soldiers to the front left the station and they heard a soft, melancholy song coming from the departing train. Most probably they now sang in Russian that "My darling will not come — "

A freight train was standing on one of the tracks and in one of the cars, atop a load of lumber, a red-shirted Russian soldier was playing the accordion. A crowd gathered around him. The Russian was a good-humored fellow, he might have been drunk a bit, too, he sang humorous songs. They must have been humorous because, after every stanza, the girls burst into laughter. As a matter of fact, they giggled throughout the songs. A few Russian gentlemen also joined the group, they listened to the songs for a minute or two and then went on their way, with benevolent smiles on their lips. He would have liked to know what the Russian was singing about. He stared at him and at the group around him and he imagined that he understood the songs, and he laughed, too, he laughed when the others laughed, he laughed from the bottom of his heart, heartily and loudly, he laughed at the precise moments that the others also burst into laughter.

All of a sudden First Lieutenant Koltár appeared by his side and grimly asked him to follow him to their car.

What was this? Why was it necessary for him to go back to his seat when the Russian sang so amusingly, when the peasants of Ivanovo were so charming?

When they reached their compartment, First Lieutenant Koltár called a few comrades together and then declared that such things were at the bottom of all troubles and unpleasant regulations and that he was very sad that such a thing could have happened. It was highly regrettable that a cornet, who was no longer a child, at that, could have forgotten himself so completely as to mix with peasants and laugh with them at vulgar jokes.

He did not know that the jokes were vulgar. All he knew was that the Russian had had a red shirt on, that it had been good to bask in the warm sunshine with sweating mujiks in blessed brotherliness, that it had been good to bathe in the light-hearted and refreshing smiles of the peasant-girls, that it had been good to look at the girls' snow-white teeth, that it had been good to see the white hair of an old peasant —

First Lieutenant Koltár declared that under the circumstances it would be impossible to maintain order here. Officers could not possibly participate in such lowly amusements. A cornet, a gentleman, a future officer, should have enough knowledge of the rudimentary requirements of good taste not to risk such company. And what if that fellow there had been singing revolutionary songs? And what if, for that, all the participants should be called to account? And what if his action should bring trouble upon all his innocent comrades? Had he reckoned with that?

First Lieutenant Kömives took the floor. He declared that he was the senior first lieutenant in this detachment and, therefore, as a matter of fact, it should have been his duty to take over the command. But he was an elderly man and this was the reason why he had surrendered the command to First Lieutenant Koltár. The commandant should be an energetic man. He had not dared to take the responsibility. But even he would never have dreamed of such a thing ever occurring in their midst.

He begged them not to make the difficult position of the command even more difficult. Such occurrences might be directly responsible for disciplinary measures, and that would be very disheartening. He begged them to refrain in the future from such transgressions in their own interests. And, of course, in the interests of their detachment.

He would have liked to answer — yes, what? That I too — that I too was brought up properly — just like Simonyi — I am a Doctor of Laws, I know the Regulations — But, quite aside from that — I am thirty-two — I have a wife, a child, I support a family — although, lately, I couldn't get a job — If you please, gentlemen, if I were at home now — if I were at home — I'd handle serious cases — What's the use of making so much fuss about this? What for? Tell me I shouldn't do it again and I won't —

It seemed that First Lieutenant Koltár guessed what he wanted to say and answered before he could speak. He said that one could not possibly be everywhere all the time, everybody should have enough sense of duty, he hoped this was a good lesson to him for the future, he would not like to have it repeated —

In spite of all this, the sun shone merrily and he tried to forget the incident. But, from that moment on, there was a tension in his relations with Koltár. The others, so it seemed, wholly approved of Koltár's energetic measures and, in one of the compartments, they were still talking about what would have happened had the Russian soldier really been singing revolutionary songs, had the Russian authorities surrounded them just at that moment.

He drank his tea dejectedly and he dared not look at the peasants and the tension in his relations with Koltár expressed itself in a strict military behavior on the part of each of them toward the other. Koltár traveled in another compartment, and whenever they met at a station he saluted Koltár, often several times a day, and Koltár always correctly returned his salute. Now he was nothing but a subordinate to Koltár.

At last they left the train. They left it at a small town on the bank of the Volga. Kinijma was the name of the town. The orders of the day informed them that, from there on, they would continue their journey by boat. At first on the Volga, then on the Undsa.

He was excitedly waiting to see the Volga as they marched across the dusty little town. Large billboards announced the arrival of a new moving picture and he noticed that the posters were in no way different from the ones he had been accustomed to see in small Hungarian towns. The name of the theater, or the place where the performance was to take place, was written across the poster in red pencil. The street was going down-hill and all of a sudden the Volga was before them. He did not know what he had in common with these small towns, what he had in common with these little stores, with the passers-by in colored shirts, but there was a sort of uneasiness humming within him, as if he had already seen these men, all of them, as if he had already met these men, with their flat caps, these big-bellied merchants, these cabdrivers with shawls around their waists, as if he had seen them already, as if he had already embraced the dream-river, the wide, yellow, oily-looking Volga — as if he had come home to this country, from whence he had been torn, once upon a time....

He sauntered into a shop and bought himself a straw-basket, the sort people used hereabouts, he ate a veal cutlet fried in butter in a restaurant, he secretly embraced the waiter, the restaurateur, the patrons, who were at first surprised when they saw his foreign uniform but later stared at him in a very friendly fashion.

At last they were aboard the S. S. Nikolai and the boat floated with them on the Volga, on the wide, dignified waters of the Volga. They traveled third class but they were permitted to eat in the second-class dining-room. He would have liked to see Russian princesses, noble misses with doleful eyes, but there were mostly fat merchants at the tables and they gobbled up the dishes greedily. He already knew the priest with the baby from the train, and his frail wife, too, who took care of their parcels and always had some trouble with the baby's linen.

The Undsa was much smaller than the Volga. There they changed to a small boat which was filled with simple peasants. The river was very shallow at this time of the year and all at once the boat ran aground. All went ashore and the captain of the boat gave the peasants a big rope.

Two peasants in colored shirts carried the rope to the shore. But before they did anything, they all sat down in the grass. They drank tea and all around, on the grass, sat peasants, peasant-boys, peasant-girls. They picked sorrel leaves and chewed them and ate white bread and stared at him friendly, almost longingly. It was obvious they wanted to get acquainted with him. He smiled back at them and he said to himself that no matter what might happen, even if he died, he would drink tea with them. Stubbornly he sat down among them, he cared nothing for First Lieutenant Koltár, nothing for his regulations, and he gave them sugar, and they warmly shook his hands, and a Russian girl of snow-white skin gave him tea —

At last the peasants rose and tied the rope to the boat and lined up along the bank and the Russian fields echoed the heartrendingly sweet melody:

"Ei uchnem —"

The peasants pulled the boat off the shoal to the rhythm of the song and he was among them and he, too, pulled at the rope and pulled at it happily, full of indescribable joy....

CHAPTER XXXI

THE boat ran aground three times before they reached Makariev. Three times they went ashore, to pull at the rope; the sunny, festive scene with the tea-drinking peasants and the sign-language was repeated three times. There was not even sign-language, to be sure, only smiles, and there was forgiveness and love in the smiles of the peasants, in the laughter of the peasant girls in straw slippers, in the tanned soldiers on leave of absence. Thrice they appointed him their brother, amidst wordless and smiling rituals, to the liturgy of the common tea-cup and the common rope....

The wide, sandy bank beckoned to him, and the masterless little rowing boats, the small villages, the lonely mansions, the woods. In the distance: fishermen, women washing linen in the river, bathing children, and once in a while, a many-towered monastery —

"Officers' meeting!"

In the third-class "lounge" of the weather-beaten Undsa boat, standing somewhat aside from the respectfully staring peasants, First Lieutenant Koltár rendered a report after the roll-call:

"The journey will come to an end to-night. We shall arrive to-night in that certain Makariev where we shall be interned for the time being. We don't know any details yet, but, for the sake of united action, mutual understanding is necessary. We may achieve something only if we appear united against the Russians, and trust our command. There is strength in acting together. Among ourselves, we shall continue to cultivate our own, so far exemplary and beautiful, discipline. We have our own regulations, oft-proved and obligatory for all of us, we shall not worship alien gods but adhere to our own, to our own order. And, since First Lieutenant Kömives is the senior first lieutenant present, I will now give the floor to First Lieutenant Kömives, who will explain certain things."

Out there, the clear waters of the Undsa rippled, on the banks, silent monks weeded the gardens of monasteries, the setting sun poured carmine over the countryside, Premier Tisza spoke frankly to the House about the losses in Volhynia, a fisherman's net was caught in a long since sunk raft, the newspapermen in the editorial offices of the Népszava had already arrived, somewhere in the Dunántul a government employee bawled out a war-widow because she dared claim her alimony, a diplomatic messenger was eating his dinner in the dining-car of the Orient Express, a woman at Erkörtvélyes just got an official notification of her husband's death and now she was screaming in grief, somewhere in the reserves a lieutenant asked another card to "five" in baccarat and lost his equipment-allowance, at last a perfume manufacturer had also got a contract, a large order for Eau de Cologne for officers, and now he bought his wife a new diamond bracelet, a lung was pierced, English gentlemen were bothered at the eighth tee because a messenger arrived from Westminster Palace, a high-school student was cramming for an exam, a little girl was picking gooseberries, the beflowered train from Ivanovo was approaching the front, a court-martial sentenced a spy to death, dead soldiers rolled down into a valley from a hill, hear, hear First Lieutenant Kömives.

He was hereby officially handing over the command to First Lieutenant Koltár who had always energetically and carefully represented our interests and had maintained exemplary order. He himself would always gladly submit himself to his orders and he begged the gentlemen, especially the younger ones, cornets and down, to support the command so that there should be no cause for severe regulations. It seemed that the rumor that aspirants would not be treated as officers had been unfounded, the Russians had not discriminated against them so far and as long as the Russians maintained their present attitude, our own command would also continue the present practice. The command did not wish to examine whether everybody was entitled to the rank he was at present displaying or not, but let all those who wore insignia not properly due to them be reminded that they were directly responsible for whatever action they had taken and would have to account for their deeds upon their return to the Fatherland. And one more thing. And this would be his last official act before definitely surrendering the exclusive command to First Lieutenant Koltár. "Never forget, gentlemen, that we are officers. Never forget that we find ourselves now in this humiliating position only because we were fighting for the Fatherland. Bear your sorrow with dignity and becoming grief. Until the time we shall be exonerated from our burden, bear your fate with resignation, remember that, until our rehabilitation, we shall be suffering under the heavy weight of a grave accusation — even though we fought until our strength gave way, even though our falling into captivity was not our fault but was entirely the result of our unescapable destiny. And, until the time we shall be absolved from this horrible blame, until the moment when we may once more walk with clear conscience, we cannot honestly enjoy anything. Always express this state of mind in possible private intercourse with the enemy, never forget that there can be no possible relations between us and the enemy except when absolutely necessary, be careful never to relinquish your noble reserve and pride. And as far as the younger gentlemen, cornets and down, are concerned, I have a special request to make. I am aware of the natural desires of youth. But I beg of you, gentlemen, restrict these natural desires to the minimum. Don't let your blood and your natural instincts silence the grief of the patriot. Live modestly and restrictedly and with the utmost reserve. Don't demand anything of women, don't appear bumptious and impertinent. If you are invited to a house, behave courteously and politely, as becoming a gentleman and an officer. And, especially, beware of the excessive use of intoxicants. Among many other bad habits, this noxious habit spreads extraordinarily at the front. Do try to moderate the use of alcoholic beverages. . . ."

First Lieutenant Perényi unexpectedly rose to address the meeting now. He said that he had wanted to speak before. He said they continually talked about First Lieutenant Kömives' surrendering the command to First Lieutenant Koltár. Now it seemed to him rather queer that no one had asked him about this. For he was both First Lieutenant Koltár's and First Lieutenant Kömives' senior. Any one could see this if he would only consult the lists drawn up for the command. He had been waiting to see whether any one would mention this. If we were expected to respect the regulations, we should adhere to all of them and especially respect the ranks. He demanded an explanation.

The General Staff was surprised and shocked.

At last First Lieutenant Kömives rose and, stuttering, declared that this problem could have been discussed outside the officers' meeting and First Lieutenant Perényi could have brought up the question when the younger gentlemen were not present. It was regrettable that it happened thus, nevertheless the problem demanded to be solved at once and, therefore, the meeting would be adjourned. He requested the officers to gather again in an hour. He hoped that by that time they would find a peaceable and yet military solution.

In an hour, the meeting convened again. This time, First Lieutenant Perényi received gleefully the report that the meeting was ready to begin deliberations.

There had been a regrettable misunderstanding. But now the question had been settled openly and with military precision. First Lieutenant Perényi did not want to be commandant, both he and First Lieutenant Kömives were only reservists and successfully to tackle the task ahead of him, the commandant must be a thorough soldier — one who had been accustomed to military discipline since early childhood. Therefore, both of them surrendered the command to First Lieutenant Koltár.

First Lieutenant Koltár solemnly took over the command from the senior officers and the grave problem was at last solved. Roll-call was the next item on the program and it was disclosed that Lieutenant Papp was missing. The lieutenant's brother gave no clew to his brother's whereabouts, he merely smiled and assured the meeting that he would be here presently. He was busy now. Finally it was revealed that he had withdrawn with the boat's charwoman to a cabin. He even had locked the door. First Lieutenant Koltár energetically knocked on the door but Lieutenant Papp replied that he could not be bothered just then.

They called the captain of the boat but he merely smiled and said that he could render no assistance, let them be; the poor couple. But it was impossible to let the matter be; after all, it would exercise an extraordinarily demoralizing effect on the younger gentlemen were there no measures taken.

At last Lieutenant Papp showed up. He was annoyed and irritated and demanded to know why he had been bothered. The matter was no longer discussed by the meeting, this incredible offense against discipline was not fit to be argued before the younger element. A Council was immediately formed to try the case. But Lieutenant Papp declared that private affairs could not be tried by the Council. This, however, was no defense and everybody was enraged. Finally, a deposition was drawn up and the Council announced that as far as retribution was concerned it would be decided upon in Makariev. And if Lieutenant Papp continued to exempt himself from discipline the Council would find ways and means to fix him up. After all, this was a nice way to express his gratitude for the permission to his brother to come with them.

Members of the Council immediately sat down and began to draw up the deposition in the light of a tiny oil-lamp, but for the time being, they merely laid down the more important data. They had to finish it in a hurry, for the illuminated harbor of the little town hove into sight and they had to disembark.

They arrived in a peppery and querulous mood. There were many who sided with Lieutenant Papp and who dared utter the heresy that his private affairs could have no conceivable effect upon the fate of the group. But, to be frank, the overwhelming majority was against Papp. These maintained that the command, which had taken good care of them so far, could not do anything if there was no discipline. Either Lieutenant Papp would defer to authority or he would be boycotted.

The excitement of the arrival was practically nothing compared to the excitement the argument had provoked and they did not even appreciate the courtesy of the old Russian colonel who had politely come to the dock to meet them and who delivered a neat little speech in their honor. The colonel was an old soldier with a husky voice and he was deeply touched when he greeted them. He spoke in a cracked voice and tears were flowing from his eyes.

Szivacsek said that he had wished them all the good in the world and had blessed them.

CHAPTER XXXII

THE summer flew like a light sailboat. They were divided into two groups and quartered in two houses. They learned that the Russian name of that white, elongated cake they ate for breakfast was bulki. They ate lunch at a restaurant, they got acquainted with Russian dishes and had ice-cream after lunch. Szivacsek read to them war correspondence from the Russkoye Slovo. Once a Russian journalist wrote that the Hungarian fields would soon echo to the clatter of Russian hoofs. This he wrote in a report entitled "At the Foot of the Carpathians." They discussed it when they went to swim in the Undsa, and they talked of the chances of the contending armies while lazily enjoying the fine, warm sand. They were regularly paid and the sugar portions were regularly distributed. Lieutenant Papp's affair was forgotten, they went for walks in the city accompanied by guards. The colonel greatly respected them, he absolutely approved of the fact that they had their own command, and he asked them several times whether they had any wishes, whether he could do anything for them.

One of their guards was a Muscovite tailor's apprentice, Pavel, a good-natured and good-humored kid, who had voluntarily joined the army. He was an orphan. When they went for walks, he always asked that Pavel should be detailed to guard him and Pavel talked to him in Russian while he answered him in Hungarian. They did not understand one word of each other's talk but they walked side by side like friends and he often thought that the conversation of birds must have resembled theirs. It was of no importance whether they understood each other or not, most probably they uttered sounds and chattered and twittered merely to hear each other's friendly voices.

One day he noticed that the colonel was following him. He must have overheard his conversation with Pavel for he stopped them and reproachfully said something to Pavel. When the colonel left them, Pavel was sad and he cast his eyes down, and he no longer walked by his side, he followed him at a distance of two feet.

The next day, he learned from the orders of the day that Infantryman Pavel Feodorovich had been punished with two days' incarceration for having neglected to maintain a properly respectful attitude toward a captive officer. Not only had he thrust himself upon him and walked close by his side, but he had also called the captive officer by his name, without adding either his rank to the address or the word, Mister, or the word, Sir. The colonel had promised that such things would not occur in the future. He again instructed the guards but, if anything happened, he hoped the offense would be reported to him. Full respect must be paid to the captive officers.

Lieutenant Hoffmann was the commandant of his group, the same officer who had led him to rapport in the forest of Darnitza. First Lieutenant Koltár had retained command of the other group, which contained the older officers, but he was, at the same time, commandant of the whole Makariev detachment. Some of them contended that, as a matter of fact, Koltár ought to be given the title of garrison commander.

There was always something the matter with the Hoffmann group. The colonel provided excellent food for them but they kicked about it. They claimed they could have better food for the money they had to pay. Some of them stopped going to the restaurant, bought meat and vegetables at the market and cooked stews and goulash for themselves. Indeed, they lived far more cheaply. But when more wanted to do the same First Lieutenant Koltár intervened and declared that they could not do this to the colonel. It was obvious that the colonel was getting a rake-off from the restaurateur; one or two might do it, but they could not possibly provoke the colonel's anger in this manner. Anyway, there was always something the matter with the Hoffmann group. It seemed there was no discipline there.

And then there was the case of the sheets.

The officer shouldn't make so much fuss about them. The colonel had taken upon himself this business, he would certainly get the sheets, the mattresses, the bedcovers. It was unwise to ask permission to buy them themselves. The colonel had a thousand ways at his disposal to repay their mistrust.

But, aside from these things, it was a perfect vacation. They walked about in the town, and there was the Undsa — He wrote home enthusiastic letters about the clear waters of the Undsa, its wide, sandy beaches, the many-towered monastery farther up the bank.

The first letters from home began to arrive. Short sentences on green postal cards. They roused him up from the joys of the vacation. He received two cards in quick succession. The card from his family deeply moved him, they could hardly conceal their happiness. That he was secure at last. That he was no longer a part of that mad, killing rush. The other card was from his brother, and reading it, he realized that he met his brother for the first time in his life.

He met his brother for the first time in his life, he saw him for the first time —

Strange and peculiar words were in the letter. "Dear brother, at last I am also doing my duty, people can no longer look at me with reproachful glances — "

His brother, who had been exempt, had voluntarily joined the Army. He wrote that he could not look into people's eyes, he had read reproaches in them everywhere. "I could not bear it, I could not bear the thought that you, married and the father of a child, were at the front, fighting. I surrendered my exemption and joined up. I am now in a non-coms' training school, my sergeant is very satisfied with me — "

His brother — who had been exempt — for whom his mother had worried. Who could not bear the reproachful looks. But — who had looked at him reproachfully? The concert-director? The quartermaster? The sergeant with the canned meat? The corporal who doled out the boots? Who? The men who read the official bulletins aloud? The pensionaries who, after dinner, sat down and stuck little flags on pins into maps?

And then, "my sergeant is satisfied with me —" Who was that sergeant? His brother was a Doctor of Laws, thirty years old, a mature gentleman, and now he was happy and proud because his sergeant was satisfied with him! Did such people still exist? Poor mother. Poor, poor mother. But how, how could he have guessed, how could he have known that Pyotr would not shoot him down before the charge? Incredible. His brother, yes, his brother now bared his proud and clean chest to the bayonets and had sent him here, into a vacation in chains.

His brother was a believer and he had no doubts and he saw the world around him clean and pure. A hero. So that was it. He met his brother for the first time on the banks of the Undsa. It was there that they first got acquainted. He introduced himself only to-day.

He dropped the card wearily and collapsed. They put him on his bed and gave him vinegar to smell, but he could not tell them what was the matter with him. He said, half in a feverish dream, half awake, that a great doubt had suddenly swooped down upon him and had shaken him. Something had broken within him, it was that made him faint. They listened to him benevolently, and they acted, the comrades acted, as if they believed him. They assured him that, in a day, he would not even remember it. He should not go bathing in the Undsa, however.

Perhaps it was the Undsa, but the fact remained that he collapsed when he got the news. He did not go down to the Undsa any more, he merely sat at the window and gazed at the little side-street and he reasoned that there must have been many more like his brother. Many more who did not know how to go about, many more who knew nothing of the dangers of the Oriental markets for German dry-goods. And nothing of the Berlin-Bagdad railroad. Many to whom the world hegemony of the nitrate fields was of no importance. They just looked proudly forward and did not know that there were pitfalls before the trenches and deadly stakes at the bottom of the pitfalls. And what if they knew? Would the fact that one knew everything help him? The one who knew did not have to face it. And what would he do when standing face to face with that little dark hole in the rifle pointed at him by a desperate and trembling hand? What?

And there was, for instance, Lieutenant Lencz. With four medals of bravery across his chest. He must have done something to get those four medals! Now he was eating his own food, was Lencz, but only until to-morrow. Lieutenant Lencz hoped that his four medals would be appreciated at home. He hoped that he would be appointed first lieutenant immediately upon his return. He hoped to join the Regular Army and never to go back to the little country school where he had taught the A B C before the war. But yesterday Koltár had said to him that if he would not give up this extra-kitchen business, a procedure wholly against discipline, he would render a disapproving report of his behavior at home. In the trenches, Lencz had been indomitable, he had never been afraid, he had been decorated with four medals. Now he was intimidated by Koltár. He was frightened by the disapproving report. He asked for one day to liquidate the extra-kitchen. There would not be any more goulashes for him after to-morrow. To-morrow he too would eat Russian food and adhere to discipline. He had not been afraid of the dark little hole. But the report frightened him. Where was his heroism? the four medals? What was the matter with the four medals? He was afraid that Koltár's opinion of him would successfully counterbalance the weight of his four medals.

He could not see the hero in Lieutenant Lencz. Were these men the heroes? the men who, with diplomas in their pockets, with books and wise writings in their heads, of refined manners and impeccable tastes, suddenly proudly boasted of their illiterate sergeant's praise? Were the heroes like these?

Autumn came and, one evening, the orders of the day contained surprising news.

The Russian authorities had decided to send the Makariev group to Siberia. It was for the first time in their lives that they heard the word Siberia, so sharply, so firmly, so cruelly.

He had known Siberia only from the jackets of dime-novels. Cossacks whipping a group of Nihilists. That was all he knew of Siberia. And now they would go there. And that Dostoievsky novel, and George Kennan's description of it — Horrible.

The colonel consoled them. They requested him to intercede on their behalf for permission to remain in the charming little town on the bank of the Undsa. It could not be done. The populace was already incensed enough against them as it was, for having caused a rise in the prices. In Siberia, everything was cheaper, said the colonel. The thing could not be helped but they did not need to worry.

It would be much better in Siberia, said the colonel.

CHAPTER XXXIII

SZIVACSEK, of whom he had always been envious because of his silver medal, first class, did not report on the last day. The colonel informed them just before their departure that Szivacsek would remain in Makariev. The colonel's son-in-law, a near-sighted first lieutenant, who spoke a little German, mysteriously winked at them and promised to let them know what had happened. Later he returned and told them that Szivacsek had joined the Czechoslovakian Legion.

Now they were left without a translator. An Austrian cornet, Lange, who had come with them, so he said, because he sympathized with the Hungarians, and to whom nobody had paid much attention before, now quietly looked up from behind his big spectacles and told them that he spoke much better Russian than Szivacsek. But he needed some one to translate his German into Hungarian. He immediately told Lange that he expected to publish a newspaper on the way. He had already bought carbon paper and plenty of writing paper.

The first number of the newspaper would be published in the Urals, and since, for the time being, it was planned to cover only the Siberian trip, its title would be Trans-Siberian News. Lange was in favor of it and promised his full coöperation.

They were again on the river-boat and the scene of their happy vacation was left behind. They did not know what the new place would be like. It was somewhere on the Amur River, that was all they knew, at a place called Khabarovsk. The colonel could hardly tear himself away from them, he shook hands with every one of them and when the captain gave the signal to raise anchor, he began to cry. He went ashore and then waved his handkerchief for a long time.

They stared at Makariev as it slowly receded in the distance. Two colorful specks were running on the shore after the boat. They were two local high-school students who had fallen in love with two captive officers and were now running after the boat in a truly Russian, foolish, romantic fashion. They had never talked with the two officers, perhaps they did not even know their names, they had only known them by sight. They stood on deck and waved their handkerchiefs, and none of them knew, not even the two for whose sake the high-school girls were now breathlessly scampering on the shore, with whom they were in love. All waved their handkerchiefs to the two sentimental souls running madly in the autumnal landscape. Suddenly the two colorful specks collapsed; they could not keep up the race with the boat, they collapsed on the hopeless field of their never-to-be-fulfilled hopes. The bushes along the bank hid them from view and the boat went cruelly on its way.

They disembarked in a small town, called Manturovo. They walked the distance of several miles from the dock to the railroad station. It was a little cold already and the train was due to arrive late at night. It was after midnight when, weary and fatigued, they rose to drag themselves to the track where their train was waiting. They wanted to board it, but then something happened.

First Lieutenant Koltár prohibited boarding the train in the interests of the group. They were going to Siberia, he said, and everybody knew it was frightfully cold there, and he would not let the group make the journey in freight cars. He shouldered all responsibility but told them not to break his command, or else the action would have no success. The Makariev colonel had told him that captive officers were entitled to at least third-class passenger cars and, therefore, he informed the station-master that the officers went on strike because of the freight cars. They would not board the train unless coaches were placed at their disposal.

Hubbub followed Koltár's speech. The station-master, an inefficient little provincial clerk, was already on the scene, yelling, shouting, bawling. He had two trainmen and a porter and he ordered them to put the officers' parcels in the freight cars.

First Lieutenant Koltár repeatedly informed the station-master that they would rather die on the spot than board the freight train.

The miserable little station-master in his threadbare uniform was completely impotent. He tried persuasion now, he promised them that if they would board the train he would wire ahead and, at the next station, the freight cars would be exchanged for third-class carriages.

No! No one moved. They were definitely on strike in the cold Russian night. They put whatever parcels they still had with them on the ground and sat down. There was not a sound audible in the excited silence.

The station-master now resorted to threats. He threatened to send a telegraphic report of the event to Moscow. He would wire the authorities that the prisoners were terrorizing him. He gave them ten minutes to change their minds.

He returned for the answer in ten minutes.

They decided not to board the train. Not as long as there were only freight cars available.

The station-master flew into a rage. Now he knew what to do. He would show this renitent bunch of prisoners! Fuming and raging, he got in his little droshky and drove away.

First Lieutenant Koltár now held an officers' meeting. He informed them that the strike was successful so far. It was not very military but they had been forced to resort to this last measure. An officer was entitled to at least a third-class coach and even if they did not win out, they could not retreat now. Honor forbade that. He hoped that no one would be a coward. "We escaped death on the field of honor, but, if it is necessary, we shall die here, in the Province of Vyatka, we shall die here, in Manturovo, for the sake of honor. And if we die here, we shall die here too for the purity of the officer's sword knot. Let us show them that we are not afraid of death."

They all promised it and they all swore that they would hold out to their last breath.

To be sure, there was a little exaggeration in First Lieutenant Koltár's vow. It was easy to swear to hold out. The station-master merely wanted to frighten them. Now he had left, but he would be back in no time and then he would start yelling again. Or he would bring a tchinovnik from the town with him and then there would be two to curse. Some of them maintained that his behavior was only an expression of his impotent rage. He wouldn't dare to report it to higher authorities. Then he would most probably receive the answer that the captive officers were right, how did he dare to think of putting them in freight cars when they were entitled to coaches? Just go ahead and give them what's their due. He did not have the courage to wire to Moscow. A station-master in a small town like this! As large as, let's say, Ermihályfalva. Or, at most, as Szolnok. He is glad if Moscow lets him alone.

He's just gone to give vent to his rage. He will complain about it, in the "Restaurant to the Lion" of Manturovo, to the local business men playing billiards. Then he will come back. And when he sees that he can't do anything, well, we'll talk to Koltár and agree to travel in freight cars. Provided they give enough planks and boards to lie on, and enough wood to feed the little stoves in the cars. It'll be quite a pleasant trip.

Koltár was sitting among them and after a while declared that they would board the freight cars only out of their own free will. Provided, of course, that the unfortunate station-master really had no coaches at his disposal. "What else can we do? But, until the command is given, no one shall move. We may do it out of our own free will, but we shall certainly not defer to force, to yells, to terror."

The station-master's droshky was visible on the highway. Now it turned into the little alley that led to the station. It stopped, the station-master got off, but he did not come to them. He went straight to his office.

Now it was obvious that he had complained about the strike to the business men only. Well, Koltár would go in to him in about an hour and everything would be settled. We were unwilling to defer to force but now we accept the freight cars out of our own free will. The station-master would be happy, the poor fellow, and when they were out of sight, he would most assuuredly murmur a silent prayer in gratitude.

Dust clouds rose on the highway. In the dim light of the early dawn, they saw the lances and horses of a squadron of Cossacks. They turned into the alley. In front of the station, they alighted —

Were they — were they coming here?

They entered the station and a non-com lined them up. They carried their carbines across their backs. In the right hands, cat-o'-nine-tails, with leather thongs.

Now the station-master came out of his office. The Cossack non-com saluted him and waited for his command.

Then the non-com stepped up to them and asked who the commandant was.

First Lieutenant Koltár stepped forward.

He called Lange to act as a translator.

The Russian non-com called upon the group to surrender, to stop this futile rebellion. He asked them to board the train at once in order to avoid unnecessary bloodshed.

First Lieutenant Koltár replied that the group had the right to decide its own fate.

He turned to the alarmed group and asked them whether there was any one who wanted to surrender. "Or shall we hold out?"

"Hold out!"

Now they had to hold out. It was a question of honor. It would have been beastly cowardice, utter shame, to surrender now. They were desperately ready and they waited for the inevitable retaliation.

The Cossacks surrounded them. They held their carbines in their hands, ready to fire. Some claimed that if they shot now they might injure some of their own men. Others said they were in it. Up to their necks. It was a question of honor, they could not possibly surrender now, but the lives of seventy-five men should not have been risked so foolishly.

So that was it. Nobody could avoid his fate. Thus it was written: they had to die for the sake of the sword knot. Here they would fall bleeding into the dust, here, on the station of Manturovo, between the second and third tracks.

The silence was horrifying.

The Russians asked them to surrender every half-hour. After the third request, the Russian sergeant turned to his men and gave a loud command.

They closed their eyes.

The Russian carbines rattled and when they opened their eyes again, the Cossacks were again standing in line, their carbines across their backs. They had not fired. Then they marched out of the station.

The station-master morosely asked for Commandant Koltár. He told him that he had telephoned to a near-by station and that he had succeeded in getting two third-class coaches for them. They would be here in half an hour.

He asked them to be patient until that.

CHAPTER XXXIV

THE victorious revolution made them spiritless and gloomy. It took some time for the depression to thaw. Rifles had been pointed at them and they had risked their lives, yet, in retrospect, the whole thing seemed like a bad play, full of stupid and false phrases. And then, the carbines had not even been loaded. But they might have been, and then the incident could have been fatal. Why had it been necessary to take those chances? For coaches! They had heroically bared their chests to toy-carbines for third-class passenger cars. And they now enjoyed the fruits and rewards of their intrepid audacity. They had fought for coaches and conquered. Did they know at home that their small but brave group had gone dauntlessly to battle at the station of Manturovo, in the Province of Vyatka, for passenger cars? Would it be mentioned in the official communiqués?

They might have died, every one of them. It was easy to say now that it had been merely an experiment, that it had not been serious. But they had closed their eyes and they had expected annihilation. They had wanted to fall on the battlefield of Manturovo between the second and third tracks. They had dived headlong into an asinine risk. For the mock pose of heroism, for the sake of imaginary and asinine romanticism, they had let go the hands of their wives and children. The Skull was still grinning at them, at the ragged comedians, at whose expense He had played a practical joke. How rashly and stupidly, for the sake of mere settings and footlights, had they thrown into the ditch the hope of their families! The only thing that had been left to them, poor beggars, trembling at home for their lives.

They had not even the satisfaction of being proud of themselves. Why, the Russians had not even wanted to shoot. They had been merely sent to the corner, like bad children, and the nurse had frightened them. She had shouted at them, in a blood-curdling voice, moo-oo-oo, moo-oo-oo-oo. But they had paid no heed to her, they had dauntlessly gone on misbehaving —

The train was approaching the Urals. Very poor, very discouraging little villages passed by, lean cows shivered in the fields, underfed, ragged peasant women stared at the train. It grew colder and colder and all of a sudden snow began to fall. When they reached the station of Vyatka, the snow was falling in huge flakes, although, according to the calendar, it was only the third of September.

They saw, in the snowfall, a woman mowing rye, or oats, with a sickle. She wore a pair of big gloves, and she mowed the crop, and sadness settled upon their hearts as they gazed at her from the train-windows. What would Siberia be like if already here snow fell on the third of September?

They were already in the Urals and the train was climbing higher and higher. The hills became higher and higher, but, on the whole, the Urals were nothing like the Carpathians. Hardly a peak worth the name. Only, pines and pines. The terrifying Urals were not to be seen. Judging by their reputation, they had thought they would meet majestic cliffs and cruel rocks emerging from glistening fields of snow, but there were only friendly hills and vast pine forests. Even the weather became milder.

They had two guards, Mustafimoff and Kantinov, and these gave them some idea of Russian geography. They said that the snowfall in Vyatka had been a most exceptional case. As a rule, winter began about a month later. It would certainly be warmer in Siberia. Mustafimoff became quite a celebrity among them, they found out that he was a Tatar from the neighborhood of Irkutsk. He had three children and a wife, mother and father. He begged them to send a wire to his family, in a little village near Irkutsk, for him, and ask them to come to the train. He had been in service when the war had broken out and he had not seen his family for four years. He was exceedingly happy at having been detailed to escort the transport.

It was, after all, a consoling thing to know that there existed a human being who actually yearned for Siberia. It was interesting to know that there was a little village near Irkutsk and that, in that little village, little Mustafimoff children were waiting for Daddy Mustafimoff. They sent off the wire as soon as they reached the next station and Mustafimoff was so grateful for it that he began to cry. Then he warned them that they would be in Siberia in an hour.

"How shall we know that the train has left Europe?"

"Very easily. The border is in the middle of the Urals. There is a stone pillar between the two continents that marks the border-line. Beyond the pillar, that's Siberia — "

They all thronged to the windows and looked out for the pillar. Dejected and weary, they waited for that last symbol of the West. For the pillar that, standing mercilessly guard at the door of their prison, would definitely separate them from culture and civilization.

That piece of rock against which the light goblet of hope broke into a thousand fragments —

At last —

At last there it was, white and simple, there it stood atop a hill, beyond a curve, near the track.

The engine whistled, it took leave of Europe, took leave of the Erechtheion, took leave of the Eiffel Tower, of the Cologne Cathedral, of the Milan Scala, of Torquemada and of Dante, of Ibsen and of Rainer Maria Rilke, of the old Jewish cemetery in Prague and of the British museum, of the horse-races at Káposztásmegyer and of the Café Abbazia, of the swift newsboys and of the Seven Years' War, of Byzantium and of Richard Wagner, of Richard the Lion-Hearted and of the Corvina Codices, of Quintus Horatius Flaccus and of March bock beer....

They stared with bulging eyes at the fatal pillar and they could already decipher its inscription, black letters on white stone: Europe....

The train passed by the pillar and they looked back at it and now they saw the other side of it, they saw the other inscription, again black letters on white stone: Asia....

So this was Asia — Siberia — with its vast territory. large enough to harbor the whole of Europe, with the exception of European Russia, but with the United States thrown in for good measure — with its vast forests of which Russian scientists said that if thirty million men should start cutting them down with the most modern of machines, by the time they finished their job, they could start it all over again, for in the meantime, the whole forest would grow up again, it was so gigantic —

Siberia whither half a million exiles had marched in forty years at the order of the Czar — Siberia, known to them only from the colored jackets of dime-novels — Asia — cradle of mystery and vagueness —

The telegraph wires continued to accompany the train and birds sat on the branches, the sun shone, Mustafimoff had been right, the weather was milder.

Everything swam in sunshine and a Siberian switchman saluted the train.

The group grew calmer, a few said that there was nothing of any interest any more, they sat down and cut bread and ate. Warm water was waiting for them at the next station, warm tea-water.

At the next station, he jumped out of the train. He raced to the station-house to look at the Siberian station-master. He wore a very threadbare suit of clothes and worn shoes and he looked at him wearily and uninterestedly. In the Siberian third-class waiting room, a Siberian peasant was stretching himself on a Siberian bench, he was just awakening from a Siberian dream.

Mustafimoff had been right not only as regards the weather but also about the prices. Eggs were far cheaper here than in Europe. They gave two eggs for a kopeck in Siberia, but if you bargained, you could get four. If you bought in quantities, they gave you even six. They sold roast geese for thirty kopecks apiece, and the Siberian woman opened up the goose and showed that it had the liver, too. It was very nicely roasted, that goose, nicely and crisply, and the liver was fried separately and then put back again into the roast goose —

A woman sold pancakes at the station, another butter and sour cream and roast beef.

He went back to the car. He sat down near a window and gazed at the Siberian grass and tears were slowly falling from his eyes. Not because of the market-place of Szatmár that was left behind, nor because of Oscar Wilde. Nor because of the loss of his favorite morning paper, or because of Don Quixote, the noble knight, or because of the Gothic relics, and the masterpices of the Renaissance, and the curly hair of his son. He shed tears because he realized that he was the victim of a dirty deal, of an infamous treachery.

This pillar ought to be shown in schools! And all teachers ought to tell their pupils: Europe is on one side of it and Asia on the other. And, boys and girls, if I take this little rod in my hand, I can easily stick it into the ground both in Europe and in Asia. Half of the cloud is in Europe and the other half in Asia and a butterfly flies easily from Europe to Asia — This station-master ought to be shown in the schools, too; look, boys and girls, this man is a station-master, for instance. His uniform is threadbare and his shoes are worn. The greast spots on his jacket are indistinguishable from European grease spots. They sell geese here and eggs and the only differences are that eggs are cheaper in Asia than in Europe and that they put the goose-liver back into the roast goose — But of the essential differences neither the goose, nor the butterfly, nor the shoes know anything. All these essential differences have been invented by the wise human brain and the exiles are not the children of the eternal laws of Nature but of the mortal laws of the Czar. We put up the pillar at the borderline and we write on one side of it Europe, and on the other Asia.

Mustafimoff was standing by his side, grinning. The Tatar was talking to him but he could not understand what he said. He asked Lange to translate it for him.

"Mustafimoff wants to know whether you can see the difference between Siberia and Europe?"

"Tell him that I can't. Is there any?"

"Mustafimoff says that there are no fences around the gardens in Siberia."

"Ask him whether he has ever read Rousseau."

Because — as a matter of fact — there are really no fences in Siberia — Rousseau wrote interesting things about this — but that this Mustafimoff — who most probably has never read one line by Rousseau — and yet — amazing — the fields and gardens are not separated here — of course — this ought to be taught in schools also — In Europe, they have ditches and fences and they watch the gates carefully and Mustafimoff is happy now because he has reached these common pastures — In all Europe, only the fences caught his attention — What a keen mind this fellow Mustafimoff has! — He considers the fences more important than the Paris Opéra — An intelligent man....

CHAPTER XXXV

AT the next station, Cornet Lange returned with a Russian daily and told him that they could commence editing their newspaper. Lange read the Russian paper and told him what was in it. He quickly translated for him the communiqués of the Russian General Staff, the bulletins of the Austro-Hungarian G.H.Q. and also those of the French. Then Lange dictated a few passages from the latest article of M. Filatov, war correspondent of the Russkoye Slovo. This was their material.

He took out three sheets of paper, put carbon paper between the sheets, and wrote down in neat, calligraphic letters: Trans-Siberian News, Volume I. Number 1.

He divided the sheet into three columns, and his first job was to write an editorial. He looked around the car and suddenly he saw their whole group exiled and excommunicated, his heart was suddenly filled with tears and sympathy, his emotions became simplified, they were dissolved in a great, common sorrow which was present even in the tea-cups and in the eggshells that flew merrily out of the windows, upon the Siberian steppes. Deep down, in the secret recesses of the hearts, there were hidden woes and gnawing grief; the eggshells, and the little jokes, and the petty worries, floated only on the surface. From thousands of miles away, trembling hearts watched the prisoners' train; and even though, in a corner, they played máriás, there was yearning in the eyes waiting for the ace of hearts. There was gloom at the bottom of their hearts, and he decided to address his editorial to this feeling.

"Sad Hungarian wanderers, you" — thus the editorial began, and then it spoke of all that was dear to their hearts, of the things at which they looked back with misery in their eyes. Riding on an iron-monster to unknown fates and strange countries, they were racing past Samoyedic farms and Kirghiz tents, toward the shores of the lengendary Amur.

Then came a passage from Filatov's article, and then the war bulletins. Editorial Note: The readers are respectfully requested to submit to the Editor all new jokes they think may be printed in the News.

The public of the two cars received the paper with exuberant joy. They read it aloud and many burst into tears when they reached the phrase, "across Siberia, past Samoyedic farms and Kirghiz yurtas." The command immediately decided that the expenses of the paper should hereafter be taken care of by the group. It was a very commendable and praiseworthy undertaking and the subsequent numbers would be given to the officers, according to seniority, as souvenirs. In the evening, it was already in the orders of the day, and the names of the first officers to receive the first numbers were also mentioned. Those who had read the paper once asked for it again and dreamed for hours over the blue lines.

This day did not belong to Siberia. They all were at home that day, and they talked to each other gently, tenderly, deeply moved. They were courteous to each other and polite, they loaned soap and razor-blades to each other at the large stations where the train stopped for a longer time and there was a chance to wash.

He became more closely acquainted with a few hitherto rather reserved prisoners. They visited him in his compartment and sat around him and gently, peacefully smiled at him. There was a lean cornet among them, with the First Class Silver on his chest. He waited until the others had gone, then sat down next to him and told him that he would like to be with him more often. Why, certainly, he politely answered, any time you want to.

"And then, when you have some time on your hands, just send over for me. Mustafimoff knows my name," he added, smiling, "although I doubt that you do too. Just tell Mustafimoff to call Joseph Body — "

"Of course, naturally, come any time you want to."

"I don't play cards but I'd like to talk to you. I have plenty of time and I'd like to learn something from you — "

"From me? What could you learn from me? You don't want to become a lawyer? Or do you want to learn tactics, soldiership from me? Guess you know that better than I do — I see you have the First Class Silver — "

Joseph Body smiled sourly and waved his reed-rod. He carried it with him all the time.

"Oh, not that. But — look here! I am a simple country teacher. So far, I have learned nothing but pedagogy and geography and history and I have doubts — I'd like to talk to you about these doubts — I'd like to talk over certain things with you. You could explain certain things to me. You've greatly impressed me — so perfectly guessing the sentiments of these boys here — "

"Guessing? They were my own sentiments."

"What do you mean? Are you, too, so deeply touched? Are you also so soft?"

"Aren't you?"

"I? No — not at all. Why should I be?"

"Can't you feel what's coming to us now? Can't you feel that we are about to enter an era of almost Biblical idylls? Left to ourselves and depending upon each other only, we shall live through a heroic age of brotherliness. Away from everything that is dear and precious to us, exiled and alone, we shall form a little island of brothers, in an alien ocean. We shall rescue whatever we may and we shall march forward, hand in hand, carrying the banners of a new, a tender religion — The most ideal soil is awaiting us, fit to bring forth an extraordinarily brilliant period — Opportunities are awaiting us, opportunities to ennoble and to exalt us. I should not be surprised if the prison would produce a Dante or a Byron from among us — Free from all materialistic problems, free from all worries of bread, we shall have a chance to soar exclusively toward the spiritual spheres — The common sorrow will forge the chains of a new brotherhood among us — Can't you feel all this?"

"No, I can't — "

"Didn't you see that naïve and childish happiness that welled up from their hearts upon receiving even this poor little gift of mine? Didn't you see how they read the lines, how they petted the familiar words, how tenderly they passed the sheets from hand to hand? The severe and grave command reserved place for it in the orders of the day, and carefully recorded the names of those who will be entitled to keep it as a souvenir. My dear Joseph Body, let me tell you this, noble fruits are ripening now, tasty and juicy fruits of mutual understanding, mutual — "

"Do you know how to graft?"

"Graft what?"

"Trees. I ask you, do you know how to graft?"

"No, I don't."

"I ask you because I do. Very well, let's assume that you have transplanted the men into another soil. Into a more productive one. But do you think that, if you transplant crabapple into a better soil, it will bear pomegranates? Yes, as far as the soil alone is concerned, it may. But do you think that's enough? Your little sheet is not a grafter, and the conditions aren't grafters, either. All this is merely a little rain."

"And the sufferings? The battles? The struggles?"

"My dear friend Mr. Editor — all I can say is that all that is merely soil. A little rain has fallen, everything is greener now, everything more verdant, but all that has nothing to do with grafting. The sufferings have been left behind, the battle, too, and the struggles have ceased, but the trunk is still the same old trunk, and it will bear no pomegranates."

"Then tell me, how do you picture this grafting? How do you want to do it?"

Joseph Body looked out, toward the steppes, his asymmetrical eyes became slightly misty, and he answered in an amazingly hoarse, weary voice:

"That's just why I asked you whether you knew anything about grafting: to make you realize that whatever you do they are merely transplanted — and not grafted. I am inclined to believe that you can't graft humanity. That's one of the advantages the plants and beasts have over us. You can't improve the race. You have to wait — Time will weed out what's bad — But, only time can do the trick — Not the soil — nor the conditions — I don't think so — "

The second number was scheduled to be published at Tchulimskaya. He was already preparing the carbon-paper, the nice, white sheets, he was waiting for Tchulimskaya. It's famous for its cheese, said Mustafimoff.

As he took his pencils and sheets from the rack, a card-playing, long-mustached aspirant, by the name of Kovács, jovially addressed him:

"Are we going to have another number?"

"Yes," he answered, sunnily.

"Well, brother — take care a little regarding that Hungarian cradle of yours — Heart, heart, and heart again — I've got the last trick, too — As I said, watch out for that Hungarian cradle of yours — Where in Heaven's name did you pick up the idea that the Hungarian cradle was somewhere on the Amur? Even if it were so, it was certainly not on the northern Amur, and that's where we are going now —"

Lieutenant Gotthilf looked up from the book he was reading:

"Yes, and there is that other thing, about the Kirghiz yurtas. What do you mean, Kirghis yurtas? Where are there any Kirghis yurtas, Kirghis tents here? Ridiculous. I bought a Faber 2B pencil at the station a couple of hours ago — But Kirghis yurtas!"

"But, can't you see, these are only symbols — to express the sentiments —"

"Sentiments, sentiments — You can't sacrifice truth to sentiments. Anybody who writes, especially one who writes editorials, must be careful — He must be careful not to hurt anybody, and, what's even more important, he must be careful never to lose sight of truth — That's good, Kirghis yurtas —"

It was extremely painful. He wanted to ask them: Why were you so deeply touched then, why did you cry, why did you burst into tears, why did you vote me your gratitude, why does the command bear the expenses? Why?

Wearily he took the paper from the rack, and the carbon, and when they reached Tchulimskaya, where red balls of cheese piled into huge pyramids waited on the platform to be loaded on the train, he turned to Cornet Lange and said to him, with a bloodless and ashen-gray fatigue, in sour humor and with a bitter taste in his mouth:

"A little more material, if you please — I don't need Filatov — Only the bare facts — There won't be any more editorials in my paper —"

CHAPTER XXXVI

THE Trans-Siberian News was, of course, published every day, but there were no editorials in it, nor any personal views. It contained only the official communiqués and brief reports of great events. The Russian papers wrote that the Central Powers were again out of money, that they again called upon the populace to underwrite war loans, that the newspapers were full of proclamations —

He wrote that the flame of sacrifice again flared up at home, everybody was rushing to place his coppers or gold upon the holiest of altars — Then he crossed out all this, took a new sheet, and put it down dryly, simply that, at home, a new war loan had been issued.

Days and weeks passed by and the train was still rolling on. He would have liked to write that "the tear-laden wagon of pain is carrying us toward an unknown destiny," he would have liked to write that "the invisible telegraph of remembrance is transmitting the messages of our souls to our beloved at home." But he did not put these down, and everything became dreary and colorless in him, just like the infinite and mortally monotonous Siberian steppe.

Joseph Body came often to visit him and he complained to him about Kovács and Lieutenant Gotthilf. He told him that Kovács had not thought that the cradle on the shores of the Amur was accurate and that Gotthilf had objected on religious and ethnographical grounds. But, he said, he had not thought of religions, he had merely wanted to spread a purple canopy over their heads, over the heads of all of them; but, of course, one couldn't do that.

Joseph Body answered that he should have known that in advance, the soil would never make any extraordinary changes in the fruit, the man-tree would bear the same kind of fruit always and everywhere. Hadn't he been right, asked Body, the light veil of suffering and pain was already beginning to be threadbare, it was thinning, and the torments and grief were trickling off the men.

They had already been on their way for two weeks and their amazement grew from station to station. Warm water awaited them everywhere and there were restaurants even at the smaller stations. The restaurants sold carbonated water in siphon bottles, and Dutch and French sardines, cold cuts, bon-bons, liqueurs, cheese, cold roasts. The larger cities were already perceptible from a distance, high factory chimneys rose above them. The metal-covered roofs reflected the sun-rays and street-cars tinkled on the wide avenues. Siberian street-cars. And Mustafimoff said that Irkutsk was even more beautiful than Omsk. Mustafimoff also imparted to them the information that there was a university in Irkutsk. Mustafimoff knew it because he had been selling pretzels near the University for years. Many argued that the Siberian pretzel was different from the one at home, it was not even salted, but this did not essentially alter the fact that the geography books and the dime-novels at home had never even mentioned that there was a Philharmonic Society in Irkutsk and that automats at the Omsk station sold chocolate and Eau de Cologne. And why had the travelers never mentioned that particular automat at the station of Novo-Nikolayevsk which looked liked a cock and which, when you dropped a kopeck in the slot, crowed and laid a chocolate egg? Of course, not every mountain might be called Mátra but, from a distance, these mountains looked blue, too, and the stations all resembled the stations at home. There were exits, here, too, and the tickets were collected when one left the platform, and the station-masters always saluted the trains. That the station-masters' salute was different from theirs? That they put chopped meat in the rolled pancakes and not jelly? What of it? That was no reason to shoot at each other. And why did the geography books make a secret of the fact that Tchurin sold pastel crayons and that Faber 2B pencils were on sale at all of his branch stores throughout Siberia?

There were, of course, the Dutchmen. It was in their interest to deny the existence of this Siberia. Most probably they were the ones responsible for all these false rumors, for all these dime-novels, for all the horrifying jackets. They had a consulate in every village and machines all over Siberia and were collecting all the milk the steppes produced. Thousands of Dutch barrels stood at the stations full of salted butter, and there were gigantic pyramids of red Dutch cheese. That was where Siberia got her reputation. The trees were decorated with green leaves, silky grass waved on the fields, and gentle breezes came from the woods. Siberia is not analogous with wickedness: that is the product of a Central Office somewhere, it is not the product of the earth, nor of the air, it steals out of evil documents upon the Siberian countryside. The exiles, the conscript workers, all the rest of them.

Why didn't they say anything about the gentle sunshine that permeated Irkutsk in the middle of September, about the fact that they could not get off the train until the Vladivostok express, late ten minutes, arrived, about the excitedly scurrying porters, about the rice-cakes which tasted and looked precisely like the rice-cakes at home? . . .

Mustafimoff cried and his family cried when they met at the station of Irkutsk, the telegram was punctually delivered in the small Tatar village, why didn't they teach that?

Small sailboats flew on the river Angara and they were given a full day's rest after the two weeks' journey. They gazed at the passengers of the Vladivostok express, there was a slender Russian girl in a light silk-jumper among them, she was having her breakfast in the dining-car and she reached absent-mindedly for a bottle of sauce —

He realized that his boyhood hero, Michael Strogoff, had played a trick on him. He was disappointed. Michael Strogoff, the famous and intrepid traveler, had dared come to Irkutsk! And now they were here, in Irkutsk, just like Michael Strogoff, and yet this was only the halfway mark of their journey. The next morning, at nine-thirty sharp, they would continue their journey from Irkutsk toward the mysterious East. Yes, the East — yes — They had to turn their watches forward, that was all, and they made so much fuss about it — But nobody spoke of the rice-cakes. And then the wild races of Asia. A Buriat lady was walking on the platform and she looked at the prisoners through a lorgnette. She was walking nonchalantly with a lorgnette and in silk stockings, and her dear husband owned a printing shop in Irkutsk and they printed picture cards and there was a wild, nomad Buriat horseman on the picture cards and the Buriat on the picture card was aiming at a hawk with a bow — The prisoners bought these picture cards at the news stand in the restaurant and sent them home. These picture cards bought the Buriat lady a lorgnette and silk stockings, and, at home, they would be gazing with trembling horror at the wild Buriat horseman whose fantastic bow the Irkutsk photographer had borrowed from the property room of the local theater on his word of honor, leaving a deposit of ten rubles. . . .

Mustafimoff returned punctually the next morning and at nine-thirty they started, for the famous Lake Baikal. Mustafimoff waved his hand to his family and assured them that on his way back he would again stay there for a day. He was just escorting the captive gentlemen to the Yellow Sea, just beyond the Baikal. But he would be back soon, at the most in four weeks. He would wire the exact time of his arrival.

Tensely they waited for something to happen. Something extraordinary, a peculiarly shaped mountain, anything exotic. But all they saw were tired men driving tired horses, worn women gazing at the train rolling by, a peasant girl or two turning after the train and sending after them a vague smile.

Day after day and night after night the train rolled on and the thousands of miles refreshed with nothing exotic the eyes subconsciously yearning for something fantastic.

Telegraph-poles along the road, church steeples and factory chimneys in the cities, and, at night, the flames of burning forests. They knew that that was the way to conquer the vast Siberian territories for the plow, and they grew accustomed to it. In Manchurian station-restaurants, they bawled out the waiter in Hungarian if he dared bring the demi-tasse cold and the orders of the day never forgot to mention at what stations the transport's official daily, the Trans-Siberian News, would be published.

In one Manchurian city they were permitted to go sightseeing, the train was to stop there for three hours. At last something out of the ordinary! There were jinrick-shas at the station, side by side with hansom-cabs. Light, small vehicles made of reed and drawn by Chinese. He hired one. The Chinese looked at him. He motioned to him — anywhere, just up and down the streets. The Chinaman smiled and began to dart with him toward the city. He enjoyed the curious travel, the half-naked Chinaman's ambitious gallop.

Suddenly the Chinese stopped in front of a large store. He looked at him questioningly.

The Chinaman grinned and pointed at the show-window:

"Paprika," he said correctly and accurately.

Irritated and annoyed, he ordered the Chinaman to take him back to the station.

CHAPTER XXXVII

THE man-horse was hurrying him back to the station of Kuenga. He stretched out in the jinricksha and reflected: "Here I am, a stranger and a prisoner of war, and yet it is not I who draw this rickety old wheelbarrow, but I am the one who sits in it. A thousand years ago, they cut off the prisoners' ears, or chained them to galley-benches, but now — "

After all, the world had made some progress if the prisoner of war could have progressed so far. He might have been thrown to hungry beasts in an arena had it not been for the accomplishments of humanitarianism. But how much blood had been shed until the blessings of civilization had — Although it would be a good idea to ask this sweating coolie here whether the blessings of civilization, the accomplishments of humanitarianism, referred to him too. Apparently not, or else he would not be drawing this wheelbarrow now —

Why had he said, paprika? Why? Most probably he had wanted to say something pleasant to him, to cheer him up with something reminding him of his country. It was not his fault, the same people who had misguided him had spread the picture cards with the Buriat horseman. All he was taught of Hungarian culture, civilization and history was: paprika. Just as all we know about Siberia is: it is cold. That there is coal in its womb, immense treasures of mines, that there are cities there and men and universities and families and lawn-mowers and butter-factories and cheese-factories and that the earth just pours life upon them, that there, too, are loves and army-contractors and steel-bridges and joys, of all this we know nothing; Siberia for us means only Siberian exile. Csutor's son has left his home, my brother's joined up voluntarily although he was exempt just because he met with reproachful looks, gold for iron, furniture rotting in storage in an Aggteleki Street warehouse, deserted brides, queues of women waiting for a bottle of milk, Manfred Weisz, the ammunition manufacturer, will be a count at the end, the quartermaster has successfully smuggled two cases of beans home to his family, a sergeant has gone mad, cheap picture cards are in great demand, a university professor is deploring the deteriorating standards of examinations, and the first Silver Medal for Bravery, First Class, is pawned: all this we call, for short, "War." The Chinaman calls "paprika": the kings of the Arpád dynasty, and Kazinczy's great movement for the regeneration of the language, and Miskolcz jelly, and Tokay wine, and the Chain Bridge, and the Hortobágy, and the Twelfth Honvéd Infantry Regiment, and Andrássy Avenue, and Madách's "The Tragedy of Man," and the Dózsa rebellion. The stupidest thing on earth is to characterize a nation with one word. A country. Then the result is: paprika, or goulash. . . .

When referring to Italians, people say "macaroni"; and Raphael is lucky if he is included. They say, "the beautiful Polish women," and that means Adam Mickiewicz, too. Of the Russians, they say vodka, and that embraces Dostoievsky, too.

It was the tenth of October and they had been on the train for forty days. It was a beautiful autumn. At the station of Blagovieshchensk, the station-master was basking in the sun. He went up to him and asked him whether he spoke German. He did, a little. He asked him why he had come so far. For this was already the Far East. Even there, in Blagovieshchensk, the local paper referred to it thus: "Here, in the Far East —" There had been a derailment once, said the station-master, and he had been transferred to Siberia. And why is it so hot? Are there no winters here? Of course, there are, said the station-master, in a curious tone, as if he had wanted to excuse Siberia, very severe winters. Believe me, this late autumn is quite extraordinary. Inexplicable. It has never happened before. In other years, the winter is quite severe by this time. But, don't be impatient. There will be winter yet — Don't be impatient —

The station-master wanted to show off, he wanted to display his literary knowledge. He said, Siberia, if I may say so, is like a tubercular girl. The tuberculosis is the winter. On the other hand, she light-heartedly gives away all her warmth and fire in the summer. She squanders her summers prodigally and profusely —

The Amur was not far from them. Beyond the river, China. The Celestial Empire, as they had used to say at home. But all they could see were a few hills, a few glades on the hills, forests — China — The station-master's simile was certainly not worth the long trip.

They continued their journey aboard a steamer. Now he changed the title of his newspaper. It was now called The Amur Courier. He reported the change to the command, and, after lunch, it was already in the orders of the day. The orders of the day furthermore imparted to them the news that there would be an officers' meeting at five o'clock. Until that time, it was strictly forbidden to do anything in the matter of the conspiracy. We shall act in unity.

Indeed, they were again contemplating some stupidity. Namely this: some of them suggested that it would be most opportune to disarm the captain and the crew and to escape to the Chinese bank of the river.

First Lieutenant Koltár laid the plan before the meeting. First Lieutenant Kömives rose to make a few remarks.

He considered the plan a mistaken one. Of course, a deposition would have to be drawn up, in order to give due credit to those who had suggested this beautiful and daring attempt to regain freedom. They would have to be recommended, upon their return home, to the proper authorities, so that they should receive adequate reward. Nevertheless, he did not believe in it. The idea of escape should always be uppermost in their minds, but the present plan was premature. First of all, they were not sure at all whether that was China, on the other side of the river. This was only Manchuria, and who knew what agreements existed between the Chinese and the Russians? To the best of his knowledge, the two powers mutually surrendered to each other the escaped deserters, criminals, and prisoners of war. To the best of his knowledge, there were Russian authorities in Chinese Manchuria. Let us be satisfied with commemorating this commendable effort in a deposition.

Little Táncos whispered to him that he should speak and not let the plan fall through. Such audacious things always succeeded. He did not dare to speak because he was too young and they would not even listen to him.

He smiled at little Táncos and told him to try to swim to the Chinese bank.

The meeting dropped the plan. With the exception of Táncos, all calmed down and went for their tea. Táncos was quite broken-hearted.

Body was enraged.

At least they should have done it in the best traditions of the Redskin novels, he said. Biscuits and tomahawks. They destroyed everything, even the stories of their boyhood. They made everything dull and gray. They wanted novels. They wanted to be mentioned in history. They wanted their intrepid attempt recorded in history. To recommend those who suggested it for proper reward!

"Why? Don't they want to escape?"

"The hell they want to! They merely want to have the fact that we wanted to escape in a deposition. Why, anybody can escape, anybody who wants to. Jump into the river and swim. When you reach the shore you'll have plenty of time to find out whether you are in China or in Russia. Plenty of time to find out everything. They will tell you there whether any agreements exist or not — "

The boat suddenly turned toward the Chinese bank.

They hurried to Koltár and reported to him the news and, in a second, all of them stood on deck, excitedly watching the shore, excitedly waiting what would happen.

The boat reached the Chinese bank and dropped anchor. They lowered the gangplank and the Chinese passengers went ashore.

They looked at each other, trembling.

First Lieutenant Koltár now commanded, in an unhesitating and determined voice:

"I forbid you to move — I forbid you to escape!"

No one moved. The signs and inscriptions on the pier were in Chinese, the time schedule was also in Chinese. They stared at those. And at the pigtailed Chinese laborers who carried the baggage and the freight. They were queer, those pigtailed laborers.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

WITH the fatigue of thousands and thousands of miles in their limbs they at last reached shore. There was a little fishing village on the Ussuri, that great tributary of the Amur, and there was the camp. There were red brick buildings beyond the village, on the little hills. He already knew these red brick buildings. The Czarist régime had built them all over Russia, these were the barracks-cities. The churches were precisely such red brick buildings as the barracks. They marched toward the red buildings, with bulging eyes, staring at their future home.

At last the sturdy plank fence hove into sight. Beyond that was the camp. Three rows of barbed wire topped the fence, at the corners there were small towers with balconies. From where they came, they saw but two corners. Two guards with fixed bayonets stood on the balconies. They came to a stop in front of the entrance and the leader rang the bell.

The door was thrown open and they were let in one by one. The Russians counted them, they made sure that not one man not of theirs should enter the prisoners' camp.

In the yard, the old prisoners were waiting for them. They stared at them with curiosity and looked for old acquaintances. He stood there alone and forlorn, in the strange yard. There was a spacious plaza in the middle of it, and a tennis court. He was all alone again. He had lost contact with the outside world again. Tears came slowly from his eyes, he gazed yearningly at the door through which they had entered and which was now silently shut behind him.

A cornet with a pointed beard and a face as yellow as parchment came up to him.

"Hello — So this is where we meet again — Don't you remember me?" he said, obviously happy, although with a trace of formality in his voice.

He recognized a classmate of his, a friend from his home-town, a comrade from the officers' training school. They had lost sight of each other after the examination and now they met again, fifteen thousand kilometers from home. Overwhelming joy enwrapped him, he was no longer alone in this vast strangeness, he felt as if all his sorrows had all at once vanished.

"Of course, I do, of course — Julius — "

Excitedly, in a hurry, they exchanged a few words, but they were cut short by Koltár's command.

They fell in, and when they were standing correctly dressed, "at attention," an elderly, somewhat corpulent gentleman came up to them. He wore the insignia of a major, his cropped mustache was touched with gray, and he leaned on a stick, but he marched smartly, in a true military fashion.

Koltár stepped up to him and loudly reported the arrival of the Makariev detachment. Seventy-four officers, five infantrymen.

The major saluted and turned to greet them. Then he delivered a little speech, saying that he hoped the new gentlemen would feel well here. Complete order and discipline reigned in the camp and everybody tried to do his best to make his fate bearable. He begged them to accept his welcome. For the time being, they should look for sleeping accommodations wherever they could find them; there would be an officers' meeting the next day, they would then discuss the new problems in detail. Those who could not find acceptable quarters would be taken care of to-morrow.

They dispersed and then began the introductions, the making of acquaintances. An aspirant met his brother whom he had not seen for two years.

He learned that the true name of this Chinese fishing village before the Russo-Japanese War was Pie-Li-Ka. There were two more camps there, but they were all strictly segregated, they could go visiting only with guards. There were huge rooms for the majority of the prisoners and small ones for the senior officers. Thirty or forty of them lived in a room. Subalterns could not get admission to the smaller rooms, unless they were sick. But that did not matter much because they lived more democratically in the larger rooms. Intercourse between roommates was more strained and ceremonious in the smaller rooms, nobody honestly desired to get in them, but, because it was forbidden, they chafed at the restraint. There was no handwritten daily but a Russian newspaper was read every evening. Mr. Grosz read the paper and the adjutant the orders of the day.

On the lower floor, there was a room in which only youngsters lived. Youngsters as far as age was concerned, and not rank. A room on the first floor was inhabited by Austrians only. Another room was populated by country-teachers. He was advised not to go there because it was very noisy. They always sang and played the violin and argued and recited, there was frightful disorder there all the time. The room containing the artists was not very good either. The painters' room was full of large settings, they lived in a bower. The bower was made of canvas and planks. The first room, the one they had passed, was also bad. It was Lieutenant Schenk's room, and he always plucked at his guitar. He did not pick out songs, he merely held the guitar in his hand, when reading, for instance, then and all of a sudden he plucked at the strings. Once. And always when it was least expected. Sometimes the ghastly twang was heard even during the official rest period. That room was for Austrians only, they could stand everything. Von Goldegg's room was not good, either. Von Goldegg came from a very good Austrian family. He constantly perfumed himself, he had bottles of Eau de Cologne and face powder and all that sort of thing. Only men with the same affected manners lived in that room. This room of Julius' was the best. There was an empty bed there, he could take possession of it right away. Another bed near the window was also empty.

"I'd like to have that bed near the window — "

Suddenly he reddened. Yes, he would like to go near the window. Not to Tisza Kálmán Square, with the family, not to the Gércz hills, not to see what his mother was doing — he wanted to go near the window in the military prisoners' camp of a Chinese fishing village.

Julius dismissed the suggestion.

"Don't take that bed. It's very cold in winter, near the window. True, it's darker here, near the stove, but it'll be very good in winter."

Then he was invited to tea. The furniture consisted of beds, of long rows of beds, and of small cabinets between the beds. Three or four beds were surrounded with reed screens. There were about ten such reed cages in the room. They called them boxes. He was led to such a cage. Mr. Kleiser was the host there. He wore a silver badge on his vest. He was curious to find out what that meant. Perhaps he was some sort of commander, this athletic-looking Mr. Kleiser, who received them in rolled-up shirt-sleeves, displaying a fine assortment of muscles.

"What sort of badge is that, on your vest?"

"This one here? TAC. Temesvár Athletic Club."

Hm. This season, the TAC meetings would be held without Mr. Kleiser. The TAC badge glistened on the vest and he could see the yellow hills of the Celestial Empire through the window. There will be a football match at home next Sunday and Mr. Kleiser's absence will most probably evoke some comment. But Mr. Kleiser will be in Yakutsk Province next Sunday, a province that borders on the North Pole. He won't be able to attend the match, and others will have to be absent also, others with urgent business on their hands. Urgent business in Volhynia. The match will be held, nevertheless, and there will be reproaches because of the corner-kick. But no one will say a word about the long run. About the run from Temesvár to the Ussuri. Of course — War —

They drank tea and ate buttered salmon and Mr. Kleiser nonchalantly asked him:

"What's the news at home?"

"At home? Nothing — extraordinary — "

"Let me give you good advice — "

"With pleasure — "

"Don't mention hereabouts that you belong to the Twelfth Regiment."

"Why not? Soldiers are usually proud of their regiments."

"It seems you don't know it yet. The Twelfth isn't much respected here. Haven't you heard of the vote?"

No. Now he was told, in cautious whispers, that the Twelfth had waked up one morning and had seen that they had been surrounded. But instead of attempting to break through the Russian ring, they had taken a vote. By a majority vote they had declared, at an officers' meeting, that they had been surrounded and then they had voted to surrender. Only one first lieutenant had declared himself against the vote, and he had successfully got home, fighting his way through the Russian lines —

"Well, old man, the whole regiment was not there when they took the vote. I myself wasn't there either. Although — I might have been — easily — This was rather a catastrophe and — "

"Possibly. But here everybody of the Twelfth is accused of participation in the balloting. Their commander dares not leave his room. He has grown old here, his conscience is troubling him. He has become melancholy. He is working on a voluminous memorandum in which he tries to justify their stand. But they won't believe him at home. He is broken and desperate, the poor old man — "

"Is this what you worry about in captivity?"

"We don't — but — you're in it. You can't help it — you're in it."

The guitar gave a loud, sudden, and sad twang in the adjoining room, steam from the tea-cups rose in lazy clouds toward the ceiling, the banging of tennis balls was heard from the yard, somebody again rang the door-bell, Russian soldiers came singing home from the drill-ground. His heart was filled with pity and brotherly love for the poor old colonel who was working on a memorandum and who would spend the remaining days of the World War and of his life explaining and justifying that unfortunate vote —

"So here it will be — next to the stove," he said to himself with deadly resignation, and he took his blanket and his wicker-basket. He thanked Mr. Kleiser for his hospitality and sat down on his iron-bed which lacked a mattress as yet. For the time being, his mattress consisted of a frame of crossed iron bars and the symmetrical grated depth of his bed looked like the window of a cold and waste prison cell.

CHAPTER XXXIX

IT was evening. The humming oil-lamp hanging from the ceiling spread a sad light in the room. Grosz read the latest news from the Khabarovsk daily, the Amurskaya Zhizn, then Adjutant Pogány read the orders of the day.

One gentleman yelled out: "Ventilate!" Thereupon all the windows were thrown open for ten minutes. He put his blanket and the empty mattress on the iron grate of his bed and covered himself with his coat. There would be straw in his mattress by to-morrow, at least the orders of the day said so. He fell asleep, but was suddenly awakened. Somebody was twisting his nose. He was at home, the women were stirring jam in big iron kettles in the yard, the sweet smell of autumn plums floated in the air, a peasant boy roasted corn on the cob. What in hell did they want of him?

"What's that? What's that?"

"Don't snore, comrade — "

"God damn it — Is that why I have come to eastern Siberia? to have you twist my nose? Let me be — Leave me alone — "

"I can't sleep if you snore — "

"Do you think that you are the only one who lies awake at nights? Do you think that you are the only one who can't sleep? How many others are lying awake now — Why don't you yourself snore?"

"Don't wake up the camp with your snoring."

"Get the hell out of here!"

"You dare tell me get the hell — Me?"

He jumped out of his bed, grabbed his opponent's shirt in the dark and shook him.

The other began to yell. Matches were struck and men shouted at them: "Ruhe!"

God alone knew why, all of them shouted in German, "Ruhe! Macht Ruhe!"

He sobered up and let the shirt go. Silently he went back to his bed and was very sorry for the whole affair. He dared not fall asleep now. It was silly to get so excited. But he had come across thirteen or fifteen thousand kilometers, he had arrived there broken and tired mentally and physically, and when at last he had fallen asleep they had attacked him: Don't snore. And so brutally, too.

Who was he? He did not even know who the fellow was. He could not sleep one wink and when the morning came, he sat up in his bed with curiosity in his eyes.

Some of the comrades smiled. From the boxes came queries:

"Well, what happened last night?"

A pale-faced young man with a little black mustache shot an angry glance at him and inimically answered:

"The gentlemen will soon find out what happened. It was a mean attack. Against a weak, unprotected, sick man — "

"But, comrade — "

"I will not talk to you. My seconds will attend to everything — "

"What seconds? What is the everything the seconds will attend to?"

After tea, he went out to the yard to have a walk. The officers wore ragged and rather mixed uniforms. Some wore flannel or brown-velvet jackets, their trousers were patched, the collars and insignia torn. They walked by twos and threes on the plaza, all in one direction, engrossed in conversation, as if they had been walking on the Danube quay, on the Corso, as if they had been hurrying to Hangli's.

He went back to his room and he found two fairly decently dressed second lieutenants standing at the foot of his bed. They waved to Kleiser and Kleiser waved back to them. He sat down on his bed and nodded. Now one of the lieutenants politely knocked on the top of the cabinet. He looked questioningly at the lieutenant, who knocked again and asked modestly:

"May we — "

"May you what?"

"May we come in?"

"If you please — "

The two lieutenants crossed the six-inch space between the cabinet and the bed and stopped close by the side of the bed. They bowed and introduced themselves.

"We have come to ask you, in the name of Cornet Michael Szilágyi, to give him satisfaction for the insult of last night — "

So that was why the lieutenants wore their Sunday clothes. That was why they knocked on the cabinet. But what should he do now? What did they mean, satisfaction —

"Gentlemen — I shall send my seconds to you — "

The lieutenants politely bowed and went away. He could not see either amazement, or surprise, or curiosity in the others' faces. Everybody in the room had heard the affair, yet every one of them acted as if the whole thing had taken place in a locked room, in great secret. He thought that everybody would burst out laughing, that they would smile at him, encourage him. But no! They did not even wink. He had to go on with the joke. Or, wasn't it a joke? What was it, then — was he going to fight a duel with Szilágyi? Were they going to exchange shots? So there were other places beside the front and the station of Manturovo where one could die. So one could die thirteen-thousand versts from home, in a Chinese fishing village, torn between despair and hope, behind humiliating bars, hit by the bullet of a comrade, for the honor of one's nose! He brushed his clothes and, with a serious mien, went into Kleiser's box. He did not sit down, he was quite solemn and ceremonious.

"Will you please be kind enough to be my second in my affair of honor with Cornet Michael Szilágyi?"

Then he remarked, quite casually, that in the old camp, at Makariev, the Russians had not permitted them to have pistols, or revolvers, or swords. Interesting, wasn't it? No?

He received no reply because the adjutant was already announcing the beginning of the officers' meeting and they had to hurry.

They gathered in the yard, but they did not stand in line, only in a great circle. The Honvéds separately and separately the Commons.* The Honvéds had a comman-

* TRANSLATOR'S NOTE: The Royal Hungarian Honvéd Army, consisting of a limited number of infantry, cavalry (hussar), and artillery regiments, was created for the express purpose of defending Hungary from outside attacks and was not supposed to cross the borderline. The literal translation of the word Honvéd is "Defender of the Fatherland." At the beginning of the Great War, dant of their own. A captain of the hussars. Koltár reported something to him. It seemed that Koltár had already picked up some sort of job for himself. The captain was a pleasant-looking, tanned man. He wore a gold-braided dress coat. But he had no red breeches, he wore green trousers, Russian trousers. He greeted the newly arrived Honvéds, then led them all over to the Commons. There were reports again, but now they reported to the Major. The Major stepped into the center of the circle and opened the meeting:

"Bitte, meine Herren, kommod stehen zu wollen — Stand comfortably, gentlemen — "

A gaunt uhlan stood next to him. He wore a gold-braided blue coat and torn slippers. He had a pair of red breeches, too, but they were considerably frayed at his ankles and aimless shreds of ribbons covered the tattered slippers. The uhlan must have misunderstood his look, for he came up to him, placed the two slippers "at attention," extended his right hand and said friendly:

"My name is Baron Fest — "

He spoke in a whisper because the meeting was already under way. But this fact did not greatly disturb Baron Fest. He continued:

"Do you know algebra?"

"No, I don't. I always flunked my algebra exams.

Too bad. The Baron became quite sad. His only joy was algebra, he had already reached the integral and differential calculus. The Baron went on talking, but he dared however, by a special act of the Hungarian Parliament, it was placed under the command of General Headquarters and was permitted to fight in foreign countries together with other branches of the Austro-Hungarian Army. The overwhelming majority of the Regular Army of the late Austro-Hungarian Monarchy consisted of the Imperial and Royal Regiments, generally called the Common Regiments, or, for short, the Commons, because the cost of maintenance was, to a considerable extent, equally shared by the two countries composing the Dual Monarchy. The official language of the Commons was the German, that of the Honvéds the Hungarian, and there existed a constant rivalry between the Hungarian Common Regiments and the Honvéds. The Austrian equivalent of the Honvéd Army was the Landwehr.

not listen to him, he was afraid something unpleasant might happen to him if they discovered that he was talking during an officers' meeting. The Baron asked him why he was so interested in that gabble? He suggested that they should talk instead of listening to the Major's speech. But he dared not and he listened to the Major's every word. The Major was just then explaining the status of the newly arrived gentlemen. He expressed satisfaction with First Lieutenant Koltár's speech. Aside from certain small matters, which were quite insignificant, he was very much satisfied with the command of the Makariev detachment. One question, however, was to be settled right at once, for good and all. And this was the question of seniority. The Makariev detachment attended to the matter very tactfully, yet he could not possibly suppress his surprise at the fact that the question had come up at all. The same regulations were to be followed in captivity as at home. It was incredible that, in certain instances, it was still a matter to be argued just what the status of senior reserve officers was. The Regulations clearly prescribe that the Regular Army officers always enjoy a priority over the reserve officers everywhere and at all times. The matter had been correctly settled yet the Messrs. Kömives and Perényi had had no right to demand respect for their seniority. First Lieutenant Koltár had been entitled to the command from the beginning, there had been no need to surrender it in his favor. Nevertheless, he was glad that the question had been so delicately settled. He hoped that, in the future, such problems would not arise again. Seniority in rank and seniority in age were two entirely different things, that was clear as day — He could not express any opinion concerning the behavior of the gentlemen who had arrived the day before, although he had been informed of the regrettable incident that had occurred last night in Room Number Four. He hoped that it had been caused merely by fatigue and excitement, natural results of the long trip. He begged the gentlemen to attend to it in true military fashion and to report to him the decision — Straw would be distributed at three in the afternoon and then the gentlemen from Makariev might fill up their mattresses. The orders of the day would contain orders anent orderlies, until then, the gentlemen would please find some other solution. Perhaps they might borrow the orderlies of their comrades so that they should not be forced to do the work themselves.

Major Steiner said all this both in German and in Hungarian. Then he thanked the gentlemen for their attention both in German and in Hungarian.

He liked and trusted the beslippered Baron. He asked him after the meeting:

"Tell me, please, how do you fight your duels here? With pistols or with swords?"

"With neither."

"But how are affairs of honor settled here?"

"Oh, those! They just draw up the written challenges and then they will fight it out when they get home."

"Home? Do you mean, at home?"

"Yes, at home. After the return — What did you think?"

CHAPTER XL

HE went over to Nándi Kleiser, the Far East member of the TAC. He told him what he had heard from Baron Fest.

"Is it true that the duel will not be fought until we get home and that, in spite of this, you discuss the matter quite seriously? Is it true that the cartel, or deposition, or whatever you call it, is all there is to it, here?"

"Yes, it is. You can't give satisfaction here."

"I know we can't. Why, there is a procedure against us in a matter involving honor — "

Now it was Kleiser's turn to be surprised.

"What do you mean? What procedure?"

"We have to rehabilitate ourselves first. Because of the vote. Because of our surrender — "

"You are right. I'd have never thought of that. As a matter of fact, nobody here ever thought of it."

"You see! I am beginning to catch up with you. I am getting familiar with your train of thoughts. I am already in it. That is the reason why we can't give satisfaction. Am I wrong?"

"Yes, you are. We can't give satisfaction because the Russians won't give us arms. We petitioned them for fencing sabers but they refused our request. They said the fencing course was merely an excuse. They found us out, you see. But lately there has been much talk about wooden swords. Some of us suggested wooden swords for the less important affairs — It would be a good idea if the command would recognize the validity of wooden swords. There is an immense number of affairs of honor and it would be very good if we could settle a considerable part of them here — "

That would indeed be very good. It would be much better than the white flag of peace, much better than harvesting in a merry vineyard, much better than choosing cloth for a winter coat with the wife, much better than buying a slate for sonny, much better than replacing the shot-out eyes, much better than finding the girls their parents had lost when Mármaros had been evacuated.

"Look here — If it's possible — I don't know what the rules are — but if it's possible — I am willing to apologize to Szilágyi. I believe that will be enough."

"Of course, it will. Although there are proud souls who would rather choose the pistols than give in."

"I'd rather give in. I don't need pistols. Nor wooden swords. Please — "

The reconciliation took place the next day. Poor Szilágyi was a sickly, tubercular, thin young man. He was very happy that the matter was settled, he seemed to be a man who liked order and hated to have his affairs in an untidy mess. He was a pharmacist in peace-time and he said that whenever he needed anything, a medicine or something, when he felt ill, he should just come to him.

Straw arrived in the afternoon. A Russian cornet announced that there was a stack of straw in the yard. He grabbed his mattress and darted out. He carried the mattress on his shoulder and, in his hurry, he accidentally bumped into Lieutenant Székely. No affair of honor followed it, Lieutenant Székely merely asked him where he was going in such a hurry and why he didn't send his orderly. He answered that no orderly had been detailed to him as yet, he would not have one before to-morrow, it would be only in to-night's orders of the day.

"Go down to the orderly room, call Steve Pereczes and tell him that Lieutenant Székely permits him to fill up your mattress."

"Thanks, it's very kind of you. But what for? I can fill it up myself. And I know much better how I like it."

"If you do it because you like it, that's different. You may do it, but only if you like it. Because it would not be dignified for an officer to do any kind of manual labor, especially in view of the ranks. Just imagine what would happen if, at home, officers should fill their mattresses in the courtyard of the barracks. Eh?"

He simply could not imagine what would happen. Something terrible, most probably.

"But if you do it because you like it, go ahead. If anything happens, refer them to me. I shall testify that you reported it to me in advance, because you wanted to have some exercise. There were several unpleasant affairs because some of the officers forgot the dignity of their rank. Especially the reservists — "

But he did go down for Steve Pereczes. Why should he get into trouble on the bank of the Ussuri? Why challenge trouble when it was unnecessary?

The orders of the day that evening contained an order to the new gentlemen, that is to say, to those who had been taken prisoners in the Brussilov offensive, to prepare memoranda of their experiences on the front because the command considered it necessary to acquaint those gentlemen who had been in captivity for a long time with the latest achievements as regards technical warfare. The new gentlemen were expected to give them this information. The practical aim of these discourses and lectures was to bring all of the gentlemen up to date. If a possible separate peace with Russia should enable them to go home, the returning gentlemen could then immediately continue to do their duty on the other fronts.

At night, in his bed, he decided to be on good terms with Lieutenant Székely. He would ask him how to interpret the orders of the day.

He could not fall asleep on the new mattress, he had gone through enough excitement for one day, he just could not fall asleep. What was it? — Oh, yes — Lieutenant Székely would explain to him how to prepare those memoranda. Most probably there were certain special military points of view and he did not want to neglect them. Well, it was unpleasant, but one couldn't help it, it had to be done. Just like the exams in the Gymnasium, and the exams at the University, and the bar examination, and the exams in the Officers' Training School — He reflected that he had done nothing but take one exam after another. Couldn't he have taken this exam at home? Was there again a possibility of flunking? What had he seen on the front? Oh, yes. He would tell them about the son of the Budapest deputy to Parliament who visited the front on Sundays, wearing patent leather boots, and who liked to put amateurish questions to them in the officers' mess. He asked them about the mine-throwers — An interesting thing, this — And how interesting this flame-thrower is — When there is a battle going on, who is in charge of the periscope? And what's that, up there, on the parapet? Yes, that thing there. That armor or what not. A rampart? How does it protect you?

And then the deputy's son, in his Sunday dress uniform, climbed to the parapet and stepped behind the rampart. He found a little hole in the armor. This was covered with a circular piece of plate. It was a very small hole, about as large as a small copper coin. He pushed the cover of the small hole aside and, driven by curiosity, looked out. In that second, he fell back into the trench.

One of his eyes and his life were missing.

Was this an experience also? Would he have to tell them of this, too?

Lieutenant Székely would be kind enough to help him — Fridek most probably got home without a scratch. And now he was complaining at home about his lost goose liver with dates. And where was Jeges? and Répás? This Petö here, in the third box, was a funny chap — He wrote a postal card to the Minister of War. Once upon a time, he had intended to become a physician and the War Office gave him a thousand korona, to help him through his student years, in return for which he had pledged himself to become a military surgeon. But he changed his mind, left the School of Medicine, and went to study law. The War Office was constantly nagging him for the thousand korona. Now he wrote a card to the Minister of War and told him that the enemy had taken away from him one thousand korona. He had suffered a damage of one thousand korona on account of the war. Plunder. He begged the Minister of War to write off his debt to the War Office because the one thousand korona he had intended to pay back to the Treasury had been taken away from him by the enemy. And he told them to let him be. What did he say to it, as a jurist? Was it correct?

He could not fall asleep. What a heavy smell! Mr. Szekfü was lying next to him. Lieutenant Szekfü. How could a lieutenant have such a terrible odor? Or were only captive lieutenants sweating so frightfully? When he got home he would tell them that he was smelling Lieutenant Szekfü's body-odor for months — When was he going to tell this? And to whom?

Listen! Some one was snoring! Now he could twist his nose —

As if the snorer had divined his thoughts, the snoring ceased.

The room was sniffing, snuffling, moaning, groaning, sighing, creaking. Just as the Field of Wagram in Rostand's "L'Aiglon." But they had not voted. An essential difference.

At last, morning came. Cautiously he put on his slippers, his trousers and his tunic and stole out of the room. The weather was a little chilly already, but he stood there, in the yard, staring at the free hills beyond the barbed wire — The Celestial Empire — Celestial hills — Or, perhaps, they were not celestial at all. Perhaps they were contractual hills, between Mongolia and Russia —

Some one grimly shouted at him.

Lieutenant Székely was standing before him.

"Why didn't you salute me, Cornet?"

"Didn't I? I didn't see you, Lieutenant."

"Why didn't you see me? Why don't you try to notice your superiors?"

"I can't see backward. I didn't see you, Lieutenant."

"You repay my kindness toward you with spiteful behavior. Yesterday I let you have my orderly and now you don't want to notice me. And you talk back to me, to boot. A little discipline would not be amiss, I should say. Doesn't want to notice his superior!"

"I am not a child, Lieutenant — "

"Don't say another word. You will be escorted to rapport!"

Székely did not joke. At ten o'clock, First Lieutenant Koltár knocked on his cabinet.

"I am commanded to escort the cornet to rapport."

He escorted him to the tanned captain. There were several comrades in the line-up in front of the pleasant-looking captain's door. He wore again his gold-braided dress coat and the green trousers. Koltár reported to him that the rapport was ready and the rapport was conducted in the most beautiful, most correct military fashion. When the captain reached him, he asked, with a somewhat forced coldness:

"Why didn't you salute Lieutenant Székely?"

Suddenly he remembered that "I didn't see him" was no excuse. He had to say something else. And he had to get out of this, it was already his second offense in two days. He remembered Army Regulations.

"I went to the yard to have some setting-up exercise, Captain. Saluting is not compulsory in the gymnasium or on the playing field. Moreover, to the best of my knowledge — "

"I thank you. Your excuse is quite sufficient. You behaved very correctly. I knew there was no spite in your action. Friendly relations between you and Lieutenant Székely will have to be restored at once."

The next man in line was the editor of the Siberian Gazette who reported that the latest number of the official Honvéd publication was ready. He gave it to the captain who was obviously very pleasantly surprised. It was clear that he wanted to be through with the rapport as soon as possible and be lost in the Siberian Gazette.

CHAPTER XLI

AFTER rapport, he shook hands with Lieutenant Székely, then went to pay a visit to the editor of the Siberian Gazette, Mr. Béla Elek. The apartment of the editor-in-chief was also in a mob-room, but it was completely segregated by a separate screen. There were four beds in it. It was a little tent which, however, lacked a roof. Outside, the world moved on, prisoners played cards, conjugated Russian verbs, prepared for exams at the Budapest University, practiced shorthand, but the editorial office lived in separate, superior and feverish life of culture. Noble traditions were nursed in that little box, and literary questions and problems discussed.

Editor Elek was a lively, elderly little cornet who took especial care of the paper's editorial policy. He explained to him enthusiastically how clever Filatov's latest article in the Russkoye Slovo was. In his article, entitled "Upodnozhia Karpat," he rose to the defense of the Hungarians. He admitted that the enemy soldiers fought to their last drop of blood and reached the conclusion that, at the end of the war, Hungary would have the greatest losses in men. Even the enemy held such opinion of us. Impossible, therefore, that the Hapsburgs should continue to treat us after the war as they had before.

Then he explained to him how, together with the assistant editor, Mr. Gábor Farkas, they sorted out the contributions that collected in the editorial rooms: news, poems, short stories, articles, and the more important resolutions of the officers' meetings, how they selected the material to be published, and how the two "printers" wrote it down, in beautiful calligraphic letters. Only one copy of the paper was published. The command read it first, then it went to the other boxes. As a colleague, and especially as one who had already achieved something memorable in the field of Hungarian journalism even in Siberia, he would receive the paper immediately after the command. The prisoners always waited excitedly for the paper. It was a genuine cultural achievement and a real and important necessity. The editor hoped that he would also contribute to the paper. Of course, it would be a good idea first to get acquainted with the camp. There was a highly developed and lively cultural life in the camp, indeed, an orchestra was in the making; if that could only actually come into being, the spiritual life of the camp would reach a very high niveau.

The conversation was suddenly interrupted because it was announced that the whole camp should immediately line up in the yard. A visitor of high rank had arrived. The high visitor was standing in the center of a semicircle of Russian officers and Major Steiner was just then reporting to him the number of prisoners present. The high-ranking Russian was a tired and indifferent old man who listened listlessly to the report. His glance was directed either at a point far above the heads of the prisoners or at the toes of his boots.

"That's the man we need at home now," whispered Baron Fest, who, because of the cold, had exchanged his slippers for felt boots.

"Why? Who's he? What could he do at home?"

"He could advise us regarding retreats."

"Who?"

"This Russian here. General Nishchenko. He is the most famous 'retreater' in the world's history. They teach his retreat in the Russo-Japanese War in war colleges. It's a model. But Grand Duke Nikolai Nikolaievitch did not understand his explanation, called him down for his retreat, insulted and humiliated him. He tore the straps off his trousers and Nishchenko is not permitted to sew them on again. But his retreat is taught in schools — "

Poor General Nishchenko. He is heart-broken. What does the World War mean to him if he can't be on the front and can't retreat! If he is merely in charge of prisoners' camps — at a time when he would like to lead armies backward! What does life mean to him, if he is not permitted to wear the trousers-straps of the Amur Cossacks — There are strange sorrows in the world. A World War is accompanied by much bitterness —

Dr. Waletzky, on the other hand — Dr. Walezky, captain in the reserve, from Warsaw. He is at home now. Of course, it's merely a question of luck. He was an insignificant little lawyer, and he had an office, somewhere in Kosciusko Street, or, perhaps, in Rzevuski Street, but it just would not turn in any profit. He tried a lot of things, but he would never have thought that a World War might help him. He had forgotten all about the fact that, once upon a time, he had been drafted and had been made an officer in the reserve. Sophie was growing up, the boys, too, were about to enter college, he worked a lot, sweating, perspiring, it was difficult to make enough out of that small installment business to whose clientele he attended. Thus they lived, scraping together their necessities with great difficulty. Then came the World War and Dr. Waletzky was also called to the colors. Fat, bald, aging, Dr. Waletzky put on his first lieutenant's uniform. People turned after him in the streets of Warsaw, they turned after him with sympathy and pity. Do we need such battered old men, they asked. But Dr. Waletzky did not mind them. Nothing worse than what he had been going through all these years could possibly come. Why, these past weeks he had often been scaling, in secret only, of course, the depth of the courtyard. From the third floor. He had been too afraid to jump and to put an end to all this, he did not have the courage to leave his unfortunate family behind. Although he knew quite well that it could not be dragged on much longer. And as long as he had to die, well, why not have some nice and decent solution? The war was to him like a first prize in a lottery. He did not need to lie now, nor to hide anything, he needed no subterfuges. To be sure, he would have gone voluntarily had he not been called, but it would have been rather complicated to explain it to the family. As it happened, it was a welcome force. He could not help, he had to go, the Czar called him, he could not resist. He would die somewhere in a Carpathian valley, or would be stretched out on a highway somewhere in the Ukraine, and then a letter would go to the widow of Dr. Waletzky, First Lieutenant in the reserve, in the city of Warsaw. There would be some pension for her, the Czar would take care of the orphans of the hero who died for Russia, his grandchildren would be no longer merely assimilated Poles but true Russians, one of them might even serve in the Czar's Guard. Sophie would also get a dowry somehow. This war was a blessing.

But it did not turn out that way. When the Austrians organized the Polish Legions, the Russians suddenly discovered a very serviceable personality in Dr. Waletzky. They quickly made a captain out of him and, to show the Polish Nation how much they appreciated them, they put the Warsaw shyster lawyer into an excellent position. He was appointed commandant of a prisoners' camp in the Far East. It was a fine thing for him, because he could make some extra money on the side. Now the whole family lived there, Mrs. Waletzky occupied a very important social position on the bank of the Amur, and the beautiful Sophie Waletzky rode for hours every morning. Her bewitching hair, loosening under her black hat, flew after her in the wind—

Of course, Dr. Waletzky treated the prisoners very severely. Why, that was his job, his bread, his only chance. He tolerated nothing that was not strictly in accordance with regulations, he could not run the risk of being branded an ally of the Central Powers and of the Imperial Ottoman Army. He had to be severe in order not to be suspected.

He stood there, before General Nishchenko, as if he had swallowed a stick, as erect, as straight. He looked happy and contented, at last the battered canoe of his life had reached shore. And a safe shore, too. He stood there before the poor, embittered, aimless Amur cavalry general to whom Fate, as the last dose of humiliation, dealt out the ungraceful rôle of inspecting prisoners' camps.

The general said that, on the whole, he was satisfied with the camp. There was order in the camp, the prisoners seemed to be fairly patient, he could see that they respected their own superiors which showed that they were imbued with the proper spirit. This was most commendable. He was satisfied with the prisoners. But several of the guards smelled of alcohol. How could that be possible? One of the guards at the door showed unmistakable evidences of drunkenness.

Dr. Waletzky, captain in the reserves, went pale. He began to stammer. He said it was impossible. Or rather, it was impossible for them to get liquor. How could they buy any when he did not even let them have their pay? He wanted to prevent their spending it on drinks, consequently he did not pay it out to them. He spent it, rather, on improving their food. He would look into the matter. He would order an inquiry immediately. He would not rest until he found out how the outrage could have happened.

General Nishchenko did not hear this. His thoughts were somewhere in Volhynia, he was just then leading a superbly executed retreat. Small flags stuck into a huge map rose before his eyes, he paid no attention to the worried captain. The prisoners happily told each other about the snub that was administered to the commandant.

The general went away, but Dr. Waletzky was back in half an hour. He smiled sarcastically, he said he would find the alcohol in no time. But Waletzky was a clever chap. He offered peace to the prisoners. Alcohol was not permitted to be brought into the camp but, he said, as long as the prisoners were paid so much money, it was impossible to prevent its being smuggled in. He asked the prisoners to tell him where they kept the alcohol. He had nothing against a moderate use of alcohol as long as the officers pledged themselves not to give any to the Russian soldiers. He did not care whether they drank or not, but if another Russian soldier was found drunk, he would punish the captive officers.

They accepted the bargain. Aspirant Aladár Dantsek-Dayka, a long-mustached Hungarian, stepped forward, and told Waletzky that it was he who manufactured the alcohol. Patiently he had built a still and fermented prunes in empty oil-cans. The producing capacity of his still was one quart daily. It was 45 per cent alcohol, judged of course by its taste only. The cooling tube had been, these past few days, considerably improved, thanks to the expert suggestions of Sándor Novák, clerk of the Treasury. The plant was owned by four men. Aspirants Zsigmond, Knöbl, Dusko and Wankovich. They were ready to suffer the punishment, if punishment was going to be meted out to them — although they produced alcohol only for their own use, and for their guests.

Dr. Waletzky expressed a desire to see the neat little apparatus and commended the magician for his invention. Then he reminded him again not to give any liquor to the Russians.

CHAPTER XLII

HE began to get acquainted with the administration and organization of the camp. There was, first of all, this Dr. Waletzky, their immediate superior. But Waletzky also had a superior, a colonel. He liked the colonel and a sort of mild friendship between the colonel and himself was soon established. He used to get up very early; he was out of bed at quarter of six every morning. He dressed very cautiously in order not to bother the others. At six sharp the door was flung open and a Russian soldier yelled in:

"Stavai! Smirna! Get up! Attention!"

The Russian colonel then entered, saluting to the right and to the left, to the sleepy, blinking prisoners. The colonel acted as if he had been returning the prisoners' greetings.

He so managed things that when the colonel entered he was standing before his small wash-basin which he placed at the foot of his bed. Every day, the minute the Russian non-com yelled out the command, he took off his shirt, and by the time the colonel reached his bed, he saluted him with bared chest. The colonel waved to him friendly and approvingly. Very praiseworthy, said the colonel's glance. Then the colonel rushed out of the room and he started to wash. According to regulations, they might not wash before the colonel's visit. But, aside from this, the colonel cared little for them. He let Waletzky do everything. The provisioning, the drawing-up of regulations, the confiscation of tunics and caps not conforming with regulations, everything.

There were three camps in the village. Neither of the two others was more than half a kilometer from theirs. Yet they were as far away, as distant, as if borders running between enemy countries had been separating them. Each of the three camps had a commandant from its own prisoners. Theirs was the "Number Six." The "Number Seven" was a plebeian camp. It had only one officer above the rank of major and that one major was the commander. The "Baubezirk" was a distinguished camp. There second lieutenants were the lowest officers and an aspirant must have been tubercular, at least, to get in there. Of course, their commander was a colonel. Everybody there lived in a separate room of his own, a silent, monastic atmosphere pervaded it. The inmates of the three camps hardly knew each other. They could not go visiting except for a very important reason, they had to petition the Russian commandant every time they wished to go, they could go but once every week, and even then only under guard. The visits were so complicated that those who liked comfort lived for years in the immediate neighborhood of a nephew or a cousin or a brother-in-law without once seeing him.

They were just trying to solve this problem, the question of the visits. And the problems of bathing and walking, because there was a bath down on the Ussuri, with warm water and various small comforts, but they were permitted to go there only under the supervision of bayonets.

At the next officers' meeting, Major Steiner laid before them a Russian proposition. He said that the Russians were willing to permit them to go bathing, walking, and visiting without guards —

They burst into wild cheers. They forgot all about discipline. They forgot that this was not a disreputable house but an officers' meeting, they forgot that they were required to behave in a military fashion. For a second, the burden of the long and tedious captivity was lifted off their shoulders, they let out a stormy, wild, crazy: Hurrah!

The Major did not rebuke them, but it was obvious that he was unpleasantly surprised, indeed, he was shocked. Nevertheless, he continued:

"But the Russian proposition is not as humane as it seems at first. As a matter of fact, we ought to be accustomed by this time not to expect anything good from them and it is only natural that, behind this proposition there hides Russian cunning and Russian inhumanity. They play a mean game with the prisoners' efforts and desires to regain freedom. They merely tease the caged lion. They want to show us the sweet field of golden freedom so that its taste may turn us off the true path which we have so far followed bravely and uncompromisingly. For the Russians have attached an impossible 'if' to their proposition. The condition under which they would grant us the permission is such that not a single officer of the armies of the Central Powers and of the allied Imperial Ottoman Army could possibly fulfill it. It is, indeed, equal to high treason. The Russian condition is that those officers who wish to avail themselves of the offered opportunity must give their word of honor that they will not escape — "

Dead silence followed Major Steiner's speech. They all wanted to yell out in unison: "We accept it!" but the Major's determined voice bothered them. And then there was that business of high treason! So they meekly waited for something, for a suggestion, for a command.

An aspirant stepped forward and declared in a loud, clear voice that he might as well speak in the name of all the Honvéd aspirants present. He thought that it was the duty of the youngest elements first to express their unfaltering opposition to this base Russian proposition. The aspirants, as a body, unanimously refuse to accept the Russians' honeyed trap —

After him, somebody declared, in the name of the Common aspirants, that they also refused to accept the Russian proposition. Then the Honvéd lieutenants spoke, then the uhlans, a first lieutenant of the Imperial German Guard spoke in the name of the Imperial German Army, the captains, the cavalry officers, and finally a Bimbashi in the name of the Imperial Ottoman Army. "We don't need freedom at such cost."

The camp-commandant was deeply touched when he expressed his gratitude for the unanimous decision. He thanked them for their enthusiastic coöperation. He was glad to see that no one had forgotten what he owed to the Fatherland. Of course, he never even doubted what the reply would be, not even for a second. A soldier, a captive soldier, cannot give his word of honor that he will not try to escape. A captive soldier thinks of nothing but of regaining his freedom and now that we are all together we hereby solemnly declare that we shall try to utilize every possible chance and opportunity. We shall never renounce our rights and we shall always energetically refuse even the idea of a renunciation —

This incident stirred their emotions. And it also gave them a cold shower.

Their hearts were filled with yearning to pass the barbed-wire fences, to pass the armed guards. No! they would now never sit in the snow-covered forest, never saunter on the bank of the ancient Ussuri. They had shut tight the door and locked it, they had locked it themselves. Perhaps the Russians had never thought that their suggestion had been abominable — They had merely wanted to give them a little freedom. But, of course, they could not possibly detail three thousand armed soldiers to the three thousand officers. It was nice of them, quite nice, that they were ready to accept their word of honor. But now again, and forever: mob-quarters, mob-walks, mob-visits.

How could any one escape from here, anyway? Who would dare do it? Who knew what was beyond the Ussuri? There were Siberia, and the Urals, and European Russia, and then the Front! Or, perhaps, across the Gobi Desert and Mongolia? How could any one escape? And if it were possible, who would risk it? Why mightn't they have accepted this little favor which would have colored a little their ragged, battered lives?

Cautiously he spoke of the subject to Lieutenant Székely and asked him whether there was no other possible solution. The young cub of a lieutenant looked at him superciliously:

"Only a civilian could think of such an idea! We, Regulars, discussed the matter last night, and we were about to ask the Major not to risk it in an open meeting. For a thing like this is beautiful only when it is the result of a unanimous vote. Thank God, nothing went astray, but it is incredible that there are still officers who hesitate. To give one's word of honor to the enemy! Unheard of!"

"Bathing, gentlemen, bathing — "

Of course, the doors were not thrown open, and they did not go freely, enjoying a merry conversation, down to the bath. Bearded, armed Russian soldiers surrounded twenty gentlemen and escorted them, a group of prisoners, in close order.

He left the camp for the first time now in months and he looked around full of curiosity. He stared at the Ussuri which resembled the Danube, even Mount Gellért was there, only the citadel was missing.

Life-sized puppets made of ragged sacks and straw rose in the snow, as if they had been anxious to see the prisoners of war. Lifeless straw-puppets, tortured, tormented straw-puppets, with bellies ripped open, formless, awkward figures.

A Russian guard explained to them that, in Summer, Russian recruits learned the art of fencing with bayonets on these puppets —

As a matter of fact, they should have been grateful to these straw-puppets —

The Russian soldier thrust his bayonet into the straw-puppets and not into them. The puppets stood there, on the drill-ground, in the bitter cold, instead of themselves, the enemy —

The straw-puppets symbolized them and they stood and bled and perished with cold instead of them and their bowels popped out instead of their own.

The wounds caused by Russian bayonets which the puppets had received instead of themselves were still open and no physician had ever tried to cure them. The camp-surgeon should be sent over —

The bath was as closely surrounded by Russian soldiers as if Hungary had been two feet beyond the frame fence.

One of the guards picked up a rotting potato and stuck it on the point of his bayonet.

Then he swung his rifle and threw the rotting potato far beyond the fence.

He succeeded, and then he smiled broadly, joyously.

What were the games at home now, and what the successes, did they sympathize with each other at home, did they feel as much pity for each other as he felt for the straw-puppets?

Was there as much feeling of brotherliness in them as there was in these straw-puppets which bared their straw-chests instead of an unknown and never-seen enemy and permitted the steel to pierce them instead of piercing that strange enemy —

My shivering and freezing, tortured and disemboweled brothers, Siberian straw-puppets. . . .

CHAPTER XLIII

THEY were returning from the bath. Railroad tracks ran quite near the highway and a freight-car was pushed by some men. When they reached them, the men let the car alone and stopped. They stopped and raised their hands to their shapeless, formless turban-like hats made of rags. They stood there stiffened into "at attention" and desperately saluted. They stood there rigidly, a bunch of pitiable, tattered, coughing, feverish-eyed, dried, straw-shoe-wearing prisoners of war.

"Privates," they whispered.

The privates wore long, disheveled beards, and the straw-puppets which rose from the snow were better dressed than these prisoners of war. And they looked at them so longingly, so yearningly, so beggingly and in such sepulchral order, shivering and choking, as if they would not even dare to fall to their feet, to the feet of these terrestrial gods, for mercy. Thus they stared at them, their own soldiers, their own six-children-begetting, scorbutic, feverish, coughing soldiers, bearded, aged, dying, desperate, orphaned soldiers —

One of the lieutenants told the Russian non-com that the officers wanted to give something to the men. The privates' guards also consented and they began to hand out alms.

Every one of them gave the privates a few copper coins and they thanked them with hand-kissing gratitude in their eyes.

The heroes were grateful for the alms. Humiliated and humbled, they rendered thanks, the poor worms, pride of the Limanova Legion of Death, the far-famed Red Devils, the heroic hussars. One of them still wore his red breeches —

What's this? Have they forgotten them? They fought together for the Fatherland — didn't they? Who is going to take care of them, who is taking care of them now? The Lord who takes care of the flowers in the meadows? Well.

Why, he had also forgotten about them! It never occurred to him that there could be others besides the orderlies in the camp. Where are the others, the hundreds of thousands, who were captured with him? What is happening to them? How selfish a man is, he forgot all about his squad, his platoon, his company, he never thought of worrying about them. These men get no pay? These men get no uniforms? Mayn't these men get money from home? International agreements contain no provisions concerning the privates? What has happened here? Let's see. We were together on the front, that's certain. All of us crossed the firing line, that's certain, too. Well? So there are castes even here, there are pariahs even here? And privileges, too?

Lieutenant Braun, next to him, tried to explain to him that the front had been the Purgatory, the captivity was Hell, and the return home would be Heaven. All right, maybe he is right. So this is Hell. All right, let's think that we've died already and — that this is Hell. Of course, it is a debatable point whether there is salmon in Hell and pineapple preserves and whether they prepare Philharmonic Orchestras in Hell — but, but: are there distinctions even in Hell?

They got home and he could not forget the sight of the privates. He could not shake it off, chase it away, scratch it out of his skull. Where were the hundreds of thousands not interned in camps and if they were in camps, how did those camps look if those who were out of them were — were — were dying like leprous beggars?

Why didn't the papers at home cry to Heaven, why didn't the children parade before Parliament? What was going on at home, anyway? He remembered that, in another room, a Budapest paper was secretly circulated among the prisoners. It was sent to a captain, the paper was sewed into the sleeve of a tunic. All the editorials should write about this, all the crusaders — what had they to say about it?

He got the paper in the editorial offices of the Siberian Gazette.

He read it greedily.

. . . "The Gyurkovits Girls" was revived — The new operetta scored a great success — It is a pleasantly entertaining piece — Its title, "Let's Bet" — An energetic editorial — A genuine "opposition" editorial — We demand that the Delegations should be called together at once — The paper pointed out, with great satisfaction, that the Polish Club was also for the Delegations — And the Lower Austrians, too — More, even the Christian-Socialist Labor Party — Baron Ambrózy has been appointed — Official Communiqués — Successful skirmishes near Korytnitza —

"Officers' meeting!"

What do they want now? Again an officers' meeting? So soon? Some one must have reported that sorry sight to the Major. Now they are going to discuss how they can help them. Because they must be helped somehow. We must wire home, we must beg the government to do something about it, we must enlighten them as to what is going on here. Let the Central Powers get together, and their noble ally, the Ottoman Empire, too, because this cannot be tolerated. They recite poems at home about the "little soldier," and the "old reservist," he still remembers them, they throw the spotlights at them in the theaters and the cabarets, at the tenor, the ham-tenor dressed up as a private, and then the spectators leap to their feet and cheer. Now the private is here.

Major Steiner appeared with a black ribbon on his arm. In a trembling voice he reported to the officers' meeting the sad news that the King had died. He had just received the news, in an official letter from the Russian Command at Khabarovsk. They had known it for several days but, as long as it had not been authenticated, they had not wanted to alarm us, But now it was no longer doubtful.

Major Steiner informed them that there would be six weeks' mourning in the camp for the dead King and since there were no detailed reports from home, he would talk over with the commandants of the other camps just what the next step should be. If he were asked he would say that the next step should be swearing allegiance to the new King.

At home, with the family, the old King, Francis Joseph, had always been held in a curious sort of reverence. His father had loved to tell warm and touching stories about the King and his mother had always spoken of Princess Sophie and Queen Elizabeth as if they had been members of the family. The death of the King came to him as a blow. As soon as the Major said that they would swear allegiance to the new King, they all burst out:

"Long live the King!"

It seemed to him that these men were forgetting themselves. It was not necessary to cheer so lustily. They would have had plenty of time to boast of their knowledge of history after the mourning period. The ovation was not nice and it was not nice of Major Steiner to shout with them. They would have had time to do it after the requiem which, they said, would also be held, in the camp-chapel.

Until now, he had never been curious to find out where the tea-water was heated, whence came the dinner, whence came George, and all the other lively and good-humored boys who served them. They brought water in his wash-basin in the morning, shined his shoes, brought him dinner, swept the rooms, cleaned the windows, washed his laundry, darned his socks. He had never stopped to consider who had done all this for him, he had found it quite natural that he had had all the comfort possible, that everything had been brought, as it were, to him. Where all this had come from, who had done it, and when, he had never given a thought to these questions. It was as if the laid table had been created out of the air. He had known that a certain amount was deducted from his pay for the orderlies, but he had never gone so far as to look at them, to see where they lived, and how.

Now he gathered together what he knew of them. Yes, he paid three rubles a month and for this money he shared an orderly with two other officers but there were some who had enough money to have an orderly of their own. Funny little Hell! Then he remembered that First Lieutenant Körös was their commander. The orderlies had a commander of their own. They had a commander-in-chief, First Lieutenant Körös, and an assistant commander, an old Regular non-com, and these two were in charge of the orderlies. There was a large, one-storied house at the end of the yard, that contained the orderlies' quarters. He had never gone over there before. The house had only one big room and that was divided by a frame-wall in the middle. In one half of the big room lived the orderlies, the other half had a separate entrance. This was a room-of-all-work, a sort of study, here they stayed while their quarters were being put into order. There were maps on the walls, chairs and tables all over, foreign language-courses were held here and, on Sundays and holidays, the room was transformed into a church. The chaplain performed services here. There was a small raised platform at one end, that was the altar. On weekdays, the altar was curtained. On weekdays, there were profane conversations and discussions in the room.

He wanted to cross this room to get to the orderly room. There was a little door in the frame wall and beyond the door there were the orderlies.

He walked across the room where they conjugated verbs, and jotted shorthand signs on a big blackboard. In one corner, a hussar cornet taught a Tyrolese yager captain how to darn; near the window, Ervin Lang, artist, taught several gentlemen the intricate art of drawing. Through the window they could see the barbed-wire fences, and the little balcony in the corner of the fence, and the armed Russian guard. He was the model and all of them drew him. They were very ambitious.

"Habt Acht! Attention!"

The command rent the air. All looked in the direction from which the command came.

Something must have happened beneath the map because a yager captain was standing "at attention" before another yager captain, a black-bearded giant.

The yager captain stood there meekly and his comrade went on shouting at the top of his voice:

"Take care of yourself! Don't forget that I am your senior! Remember this for once and for all!"

The shouting captain became calm now, ordered "at ease," and continued in a quiet tone:

"Well, then, don't you forget that I can never argue with you. I can only teach you. Consequently, don't interrupt me. I shall repeat to you now how I should have led this attack on the Italian front, and I warn you to listen to me, because you will have to repeat it after me. This is not gabbling in a café, this is instruction, and some day you will be very grateful for it."

The senior yager now thrust his hand in his pocket, pulled out a little pennant attached to a pin and stuck it in the map. Then he said:

"Now look here, comrade — "

CHAPTER XLIV

NO, he did not want to visit the orderlies any more. Not that day, anyway. Queer thing, this affair between the two yager captains. The boxes were already discussing the incident. It was a custom in the camp to mark the fronts, according to the war bulletins, with little pennants, on the maps hanging in the parlor. Pennants displaying the Italian national colors marked the Italian front, and little Hungarian, Austrian, and German flags indicated the Austro-Hungarian and German armies. Everywhere there were two rows of pennants facing each other. The Imperial Germans had a map of the western front and one of the Russian front, too. These two yagers were Tyrolese, they were interested in the Italian front only. They were explaining it to each other, debating excitedly. They shook their heads whenever the General Staff evacuated some insignificant little knoll. Wouldn't it have been better to hold on to it? The evacuation might lead to serious consequences. They would have liked to warn the General Staff against committing careless moves. The senior captain was explaining to his comrade the importance of the latest moves and the other one, who most probably had received his captain's commission three weeks after him, had interrupted him. That was why the senior flew into a rage. How could any one be so utterly undisciplined as to interrupt a senior officer when he was explaining tactics? This was no joke, this was bloody reality. The lives of men and the future of nations were at stake, this was not a game, this was serious instruction in tactics and strategy. The younger captain at last realized his mistake. From that moment on, he listened watchfully to the senior captain, especially since he was commanded to repeat it. In Pie-Li-Ka, near the Yellow Sea. on the Amur and the Ussuri, two Tyrolese yager captains were eagerly correcting the General Staff.

At home, too? Do they still correct the General Staff at home, too? Is the smart major still parading on Váczi Street, are they still tremblingly waiting for the war bulletins, are they still excitedly discussing the retreats and the advances in the cafés? It is quite possible that, at home, in the mountain village, after paying the day-laborers their wages, they still sit in the dining-room from whose window you can see the forest and Mount Kopasz, and, gently sipping a glass of wine, they say: "This is no way to fiight — All the available forces ought to be concentrated around this hill here, around the 566 — God save them if they don't succeed — "

They discuss the hills, forgetting completely that "the little lieutenant" has dropped his revolver and is now lying flat on his stomach, never to rise again. They forget that exiles start out from Darnitza toward the Siberian steppes, that the Red Devils are begging bread on the Ussuri —

Don't they ever think of revenge? Hey, look! Let's consider that! Of course, once upon a time we wanted to revenge ourselves! Serbian infamy — Where is revenge now? How far we are from it now! — How far we are from that obituary which was full of typographical errors! Talk about the waterways, friend, and ponder the Eastern markets! And the colonial questions, the nitrate fields, the commercial agreements! How can one be enthusiastic if he does not know what he is fighting for! Or, are there no more explanations? The threshing machine is still humming, but they no longer explain to the sheaves why they are thrown into it —

It's quite clear. The strong, beautiful, steely ears of wheat are now being threshed for the bread of future generations. Blood is dripping from the threshing machine and the wheat of the future is sown in the soil fertilized with blood. When they go home, when the Red Devils at last leave their posts on the Amur, they, too, will hold the bags at the mouth of the machine — waiting for ears —

Those, of course, who freeze to death, will not go home.

For the time being, it is good to hear that there is no confusion at home. A praiseworthy enterprise, the revival of "The Gyurkovits Girls." Most auspicious, these arguments concerning the Delegations. And the appointment of Count Ambrózy to the high post of Lord Guard of the Crown is positively inspiring. Count Ambrózy or Baron Ambrózy? Better Count Ambrózy.

Mr. Grosz read the Russian paper, Lieutenant Pogány read the orders of the day, the command was yelled out: "Ventilate!" The cold of the Siberian winter mercilessly streamed in through the little window. The Blagoveshchensk station-master had been right. They did not need to worry any more as to when the winter would come. Indeed, it had been a little late in coming, but it was here now, and it raged furiously. It was nothing like a winter at home. The difference between them was the same that exists between a necktie and the gallows rope. Of course, of course, both belong on the neck. But there are fine silk cravats and cheap, vulgar ties. The cold is not always the same at home either. At one time it is pleasant, dry, at other times it is wet, abominable. Sometimes it is cold, sometimes it is pleasantly cold, and there are times when the cold is positively warming. But this cold here was quite different. Uncle Hegyi explained to them that the cold was unimportant after it reached 35 below. Uncle Hegyi said that when the cold reached 35 below, they did not need to bother about it. The human body, said Uncle Hegyi, felt the cold only when it was above 35 minus.

Below that, it didn't make any difference. Here was lead, for instance. Once it was heated to the melting point, it didn't make any difference to it how warm it was. Or, take water, it's much simpler, anyway. Up to 212, it matters. Above that point, the water does not care for anything. Water bothers about heat until it reaches 212. Then it turns into steam. Then the water doesn't worry whether it is 213 or 1000. Uncle Hegyi said that as soon as the thermometer sank below minus 35, they shouldn't bother about the cold —

The cold streamed into the room in thick clouds. Although only the little ventilating window was open, it cooled off the room in seconds. In three minutes, everybody was yelling: shut the window, shut the window! The window was open for five minutes only, in five minutes what little warmth there had been in the room, vanished completely. Uncle Hegyi told them that heat, as such, had no weight, heat existed only in the object. If one spoke of heat, it was correct to say, for instance, here is a stove that weighs ten tons, consequently, here is a warm object of ten tons. On the other hand, when the room was ventilated, only a few ounces of hot air escaped. Therefore, it was silly to complain because several thousand pounds of hot air still remained in the room. He simply could not understand how they could notice the lack of a few ounces in all these thousands of pounds. They also knew all this, and the theory as such was beautiful, but, in reality, the room became very cold and they crowded shiveringly around the huge stoves.

"It seems," he pondered when he pulled the blanket up to his ears, "that people all over the world love to amuse themselves with theories. Only five per cent. die, boys will be born after the war too, that's what they are saying all the time. But when a man cannot breathe because the cold nearly freezes the air in his throat, theories won't warm him. When 'the little lieutenant' falls in the mud, when shell-splinters make a dental advertisement out of Peti's face, when the son of a deputy drops dead behind the armored parapet, when the flame-throwers set one's chest on fire, when one has to wrap his broken leg in straw, it isn't decent to speak of theories — "

One more Siberian night passed by and when he woke in the morning, he went through his accustomed program mechanically. He silently and nakedly greeted the Russian colonel and got dressed. Then he decided to go down to the orderly room. Down to that other house at the end of the yard where the ranks lived. He wanted to get acquainted with that world. Across the snow-covered, white yard. The pure snow glistened in the sun. Nice, straight ditches were cut in the snow, white trenches. They were just deep enough to cover one up to the top of his head. The enemy could not see him, the snow parapets hid him. In the orderly room, there was a huge frame contraption with three rows of shelves. That was where the boys slept, on three rows of shelves, one shelf above another. The unaccustomed visit disturbed the washing, dressing orderlies. The only officer who ever came down here was First Lieutenant Körös, their commander. He came down every morning and held a rapport, and listened to the report of the non-com. It was his business to bother with them.

He felt awkward and perplexed, it was an embarrassing situation.

Why, after all, had he come here? There was absolutely no sense to it. This was not a camp for the ranks, it was an orderly room. The air was foul, but the room was in order and moderately clean. These men had clothes, they had food, they ate in the kitchen of the officers' mess, they were paid, they didn't know more of the sufferings outside than he did. But they did say something: they showed him cards they had received from friends, from relatives. They, the fortunate ones, had escaped these horrors, they were safe in the shelter of their officers. The letters spoke of a railroad that was being built on the Murman Coast, the men up there were scorbutic, they lost their teeth, their legs turned black; their limbs were rotting off their bodies; they were falling to pieces alive. Write to my poor wife, I am afraid she won't get my letter — Don't expect me to get home from here, I'll die here, one must die here —

We never see the sun here, we never eat bread, we are buried here alive — What they call bread here is unbaked black mud, they make it out of slimy must, we can't stand it — As soon as the thaw sets in we'll begin to bury, we can't bury our dear dead ones now; the earth is frozen; we are collecting them until the spring and then we'll bury them — We will bury some every day — You live well, you don't know the cat-o'-nine-tails, but a couple of us are lashed every day, and all of us are whipped in turn —

A sharp whistle rent the air.

A bell rang, and both the whistle and the bell sounded as if, at some small provincial station, an engine had whistled and a porter in the waiting room had warned the waiting passengers to get aboard the train. He stood there amazed for a second, he thought his senses had played a trick on him. His heart was beating in his throat. Suddenly a loud voice yelled out:

"Train to Irkutsk — Moscow — Lemberg — Budapest — Debrecen — Kolozsvár — Soroksár — Miskolc — Pécs — Hajdunánás — Székelység — Hajduság — Kunság — Csallóköz — Nyitra — Kisbürgözd — Köbánya — Track Number Two — all aboard — "

Incredible din, deafening racket, feverish packing answered the loud call. The men whirled on the shelves, crying and singing, they pushed, shoved, kicked each other, grabbing their tunics and caps feverishly —

Then another ghastly bell was heard —

The pandemonium grew louder and the grabbing even more feverish —

Again the bell, and then a sharp whistle, and then he heard the slow, rhythmic puffing of an approaching engine, and its rattle as it passed over the tracks, over switches. The puffing and the rattle grew quicker and quicker, then began slowly to die in the distance —

The men jumped off the shelves and, with bags on their backs, they ran and raced in one huge, heated, excited mass —

But the rattle of the departing train became fainter and fainter —

They stopped now in the middle of the room, in a huddle, and turned to each other in despair:

"We are late again — "

And the three men, who imitated the sounds, left the room, with pots in their hands, to fetch warm water —

They played this heart-rending game every morning. . . .

CHAPTER XLV

THERE are many kinds of sufferings. There are categories to the sufferings of a prisoner. It is indubitable that the officers suffer too: they suffer from the prison, the distance, the uncertainty. And then there are sufferings caused by the food. What a delicacy, for instance, fresh-water salmon is at home! But just try to eat salmon every day, smoked, creamed, canned, paprika salmon, always salmon. Salmon, then, would no longer be a delicacy in the fashionable restaurants. The Amur and the Ussuri simply swarm with salmon. The other day the mess-chief gave us a special dinner. He gave us pork chops for dinner. We couldn't eat them because they smelled of fish. The pork chops smelled of salmon. In Amur Province, even the hogs live on salmon. They are fattened on salmon, that's why the chops smelled so strongly of fish.

They tried poultry, but the geese live on salmon, too, and the chickens, too. It's cheaper than chaff at home. Most probably the swine, too, are tired of caviar and tired of the pink-colored salmon, which are kept under glass in the fine delicatessen stores at home. One gets tired of pineapple, too. The Khabarovsk stores send us canned pineapple most of the time, one can never get one single piece of plum. But one can't always live on pineapple. This is another form of suffering. Neither do the ranks play in vain that heart-rending game of going home. They live on shelves, like rows of cans in a grocery store. The air is foul down there, they are crowded, and the fellows who, at this time of the year, used to ride in sleighs happily toward the forests for wood, or used to stack hay in the barn, now patch ragged pants, and darn, and wash dirty linen. But it seems the prison caste system has its pariahs too. There are those who build railroads on the Murman Coast, those who lose their teeth on the Arctic Coast —

They all use some kind of narcotics, they all fool themselves with something or other, they all try to put themselves to sleep. That's why Dantsek makes riding whips, and a violin of seven thousand pieces, that's why we need the Siberian Gazette, and shorthand, and a still, and the French language. And the New Criminal Procedure which is diligently being studied by one group. If they could go fishing, if they could earn bread for their families, fewer people would learn how to write Chinese from the Chinese A B C they bought for six rubles and in which there are sheets of tissue paper between the pages. They copy the Chinese letters on the tissue paper, that's how they are supposed to learn it, but not one of them has learned to write Chinese in all these years.

During all the long years and all the long evenings, the boxes hummed mysteriously and memories of the home, of the front, were coming to life and plans for escape ripened, and there were fantastic conversations about how it would be after the war, and whether all of them would get the bonus — If they would stay in prison for another year or two, they would get huge sums of money, enough to live leisurely on the interest alone. The better mathematicians spent days over calculations figuring out how much they would get, how much was waiting for them at home; allowances and doles and war relief for the wives; all that sort of thing —

Only visits from the neighboring camps, and the sensations of the officers' meetings, and the news of the Russian dailies brought a little liveliness, otherwise deadly fatigue ground their nerves and they kept each other awake with false news: In those days, armistice was signed on an average three times a week, on the four other days of the week the various armies suffered defeats which positively settled the fate of the war — Yet everybody continued conscientiously to do his duty. They were ashamed when they were caught neglecting their lessons or their drawing, or the novel entitled "Lady Hamilton," when they stopped carving the fancy box, when their knowledge of the French language was not enlarged with at least one new grammatical rule every day, when they failed to solve a complicated equation, when no new ballads were written, when no new installments of "Akos Acs" was completed. The writers went on writing diligently because when they did not go to the editorial rooms for one day, when they neglected literature for only one day, reproaches were heard from the neighboring boxes: "That novel will never be finished — " Those who prepared for a musical career, practiced conscientiously, and at night, while the boxes hummed mysteriously, First Lieutenant Rademacher brushed back his dark hair, sat down before his little table, placed a long plank on it, a plank on which were painted the keys of the piano, white keys and black keys, and his fingers glided dreamily over the silent keys, his face was transfigured, and when he hit the wrong key, he shook his head and started to play it all over again. He played his own composition on the blind piano and he must have played it like a virtuoso — The music was in front of him and whoever did not want to believe this fact could look into the music, could look into the life of First Lieutenant Rademacher, he could correct it, could fix up the life of First Lieutenant Rademacher.

And then there were blind typewriters, on which invisible petitions were prepared on invisible paper. The petitions were, most probably, prepared very correctly and most conscientiously. They must have prepared them conscientiously because they prepared them for themselves. And not one of them had any reason to cheat himself —

Only the voice of the piano did not soar, the typewriter did not clatter and no paper came out of the roller — Only the piano lacked strings and the keys did not move, although every key was correctly marked, and the keys of the typewriter were also correctly marked. If there had been anything else to that typewriter than the letters written on the top of a table, it would have written as well as any typewriter at home. And then there were those little telegraph machines which clattered and rattled just like the telegraph machines at home, but the connection was interrupted, there was no sense in attaching a wire to them — They were wireless machines, only they were out of order, they were put out of order for a few years, one couldn't send messages home with them, although they rattled just as the telegraph machines at home did.

The blind pianos thundered no passions, the blind typewriters put down no thoughts, the blind telegraph machines carried no messages. The news came and went at a funeral pace, only small green postal cards carried it, and only in German, Russian or French. First Lieutenant Almoslino, in charge of the mail, brought them over from the "Baubezirk," where the post-office was —

When Mr. Almoslino brought over the postal cards, no one could ever understand why those at home dealt so summarily with them. Every card was suspicious. What does it mean that my wife writes in French now? Why are the lines so sparse, not because —

They consulted the chemists, they held long conversations in whispers, they held the cards over the lamp, they heated them, they washed them with wet rags, they dipped them in chemicals, perhaps there was some secret in them? It was obvious that they were written with some secret chemical, that the messages were written in some secret code,— and they were trying to fathom the secrets.

When the cards came, they sat down for hours gazing at the green messages. It was incredible how little one could find in them. They wanted more, something more than "Our hearts are full of worry, bear patiently the captivity, we have hopes that 'Liberation' is not far away." Why is the word "Liberation" written with a capital L and why is it in quotation marks?

After the mail was distributed, they withdrew with their prey to the boxes and stared at them greedily, silently, dreamily, for hours.

Here was the card before him that his father had written, and he was now gazing at his father's elongated, symmetrical letters. He reflected that it was foolish to think so much about them, these little cards had no other significance than to bring to him a sign of life. Just a little encouragement, a little air — They had no secret meaning, everything was clearly written out. It was foolish to ponder over them —

He glanced over the card again and suddenly the white window became dim and hazy, a cold shiver ran over his body, he trembled, his heart beat fast and irregularly —

Tears trickled from his eyes and rolled down his cheeks.

Aspirant Béla Kiss, from the next box, asked him sympathetically:

"Bad news?"

He answered in a colorless wooden voice:

"Bad. Mother is dead."

Aspirant Béla Kiss did not consider it rude to come over to his box and pick up the card and read it. He did not protest. He let him do it, he let his good friend, that diligent little high-school professor, express his interest. Why shouldn't he read it? They all lived together like the members of a big family, there were no secrets among them. He was a member of the family, too, let him read it.

"But, look here — there isn't a word about your mother in this — Where did you get the idea?"

He sighed and looked out through the window.

How could he explain it? He couldn't make himself ridiculous.

His father is a precise, correct, and punctual man — his style is concise, terse and to the point — his words all have logical connections and a logical reason — His last letter began: "Our dear son" — and now he writes: "My dear son" — He is a hard man, but now he is moved — He writes in a warmer style — And the letter is now signed, "Kisses from your wife, your son, and your loving father" — No kisses from poor mother — She will never send him kisses any more — His father never forgets anything. There is a reason, there is a logical reason for every word — Thus he breaks it to him — He cannot and does not want to do it differently — She died in October, because in the September letter it was still: "Kisses from your loving father, mother, wife, son" — Mother sends no kisses now. She will never again in this life —

"Where did you get the idea? Is it written in some secret language?"

It isn't secret at all. It's there quite clearly. But he cannot explain it. Shall he try to explain to Kiss that this letter is not a riddle, it requires no solution, it's obvious, it can't be disputed — Poor dear mother — He should have gone to see her when he was in Budapest, to see her once more — to speak with her once more — Now it's too late. She won't ever talk again —

He sat down and tried to answer the letter.

He took a green card and began to write and tears rolled down his cheeks as he wrote down, with infinite pain in his heart, "Dearest father — "

It was just such a letter as he used to write every week, only the signature was a little different.

I am well, I am waiting patiently, I am in good health —

Just as he used to —

But he did not sign it with: I kiss mother's hands —

He didn't need to write this, it was unnecessary. . . .

CHAPTER XLVI

SOMETIMES he felt as if it had been criminal to bury his poor mother so definitely. Perhaps it was merely a hallucination. The hallucination of a prisoner of war. But then he got a card from his wife, too, and hieroglyphics from his son, on lined paper, but neither did these contain any mention of his mother. Everybody asked to be remembered to him, even their old cook, but never his mother. Well, he had to resign himself to the idea. It couldn't be changed. One shouldn't think of it. She didn't live to see her prophecy concerning her youngest son come true. Because it would.

His brother wrote again. Proudly he informed him that he had successfully passed his examination in the Officers' Training School, they would soon be going to the Italian front — Poor mother didn't live to see this.

Otherwise, the days were full of sensations. There was at least one armistice every day, at least one glorious victory. Bread was already baked of sawdust, all the horses were eaten, one day the Russians stood facing immediate starvation, the next day, another country. One day there were no more men, the next day the ammunition gave out, then again a new machine of such annihilating power was invented that its use made the carrying on of the war impossible.

Commander Waletzky was kind enough to set up a store in the camp and the wild rumors were born in this store. The buyers were in constant touch with the outer world, and besides cakes and salmon, they picked up plenty of news in the city. They also used the Russian expression and called the shop Lavka, and the new sensations the buyers brought back from town were certainly not detrimental to the Lavka's business. Lavka-news was never true, there was not one single instance in which a bit of information that had oozed out of the Lavka was later proved to be true, yet every day they again believed, again swallowed the Lavka-news. Perhaps one day it would be true, perhaps one day delegates from the Central Powers would arrive here and bring up to the Ussuri nicely heated trains and take over the whole crowd of prisoners and start them off westward. And then at every station large Red Cross detachments would wait for them, with tea and sandwiches for the officers, with rum and cakes for the ranks — But before that time came, discipline grew from day to day, they talked already of setting-up exercises under the command of Regular officers. A few nice, lively, refreshing exercises, some marching at quick and double time, parades, some drills and gymnastics were planned. Alas, the Russians wouldn't permit any arms practice, not even with wooden rifles, although this was the thing they needed most.

They spoke of this only timidly and in whispers and they looked at the Regulars with malice and growing hatred. No one dared to say a word against it though, because, by this time, the authority and the rights of the command had been completely developed, the machine was complete. This firm and solid machine which, in their name and for them, carried on negotiations with the Russian command, like the tetrarchs in the Roman provinces, could not possibly be changed. Individually, they could not, they had no chance to, get in touch with the Russian command. Their own command took care of everything, one had to admit it, quite successfully. The Russians accepted this well-developed organization, at least they did not have to bother with so many thousands of men. The prisoners, on the other hand, thanks to some higher invisible and benevolent power, regularly received their allotments and allowances and they even could make an occasional complaint or two. Their mail was regularly forwarded, the general staff freed them from worries. All they had to do was to obey. There were roofs over their heads and food in their stomachs, and the well-organized machine took care of their welfare, of the welfare of the camp. They knew that, in the skies, lived the gods, but they also knew that the earthly worm should be satisfied with the knowledge that the high priests were in possession of that mysterious power which secured him the gifts from the gods.

Even if the order about the setting-up exercises should come through, one could do nothing about it. You couldn't go to the Russians, the Russians wouldn't even talk with the simple children of the earth. They talked only to the heads. The simple children of the earth were supposed to do what the command found necessary for them to do and, so far, this had always been for the best. They had put over themselves a government, and there were already regulations to break down counter-opinion. The Russians referred all complaints to their own command and, in every case, the opinion of the command was accepted as authoritative. Who would dare move under the circumstances? As a matter of fact, let's admit it, a little setting-up exercise wouldn't be fatal. And let's admit it, the command was often tolerant.

How many of them displayed unwarranted rank! And, since it had been disclosed that every aspirant was entitled to the pay, there was really no sense in bringing up the matter of rank all the time. Then, occasionally, the command was quite merciful: an old Landsturmmann, and a tubercular teacher, for instance, were permitted to sew on the insignia of officers. They were permitted into the officers' camp, although they were merely volunteer corporals.

A little setting-up exercise would not kill them. There were greater troubles than that. One should be thankful that one got away so easily in a World War —

The delegates with the soft-cushioned trains and the flags of victory would arrive one day anyway and then they would be carefully taken home and would be put down, every one of them, in the doorways of their homes — They would have to prove that their capture had not been their own fault, and the authorities would listen to the report of the command as to how they behaved while in captivity, for only those would be shining in eternal glory whose lives were without sin, who proved that they were worthy of resurrection —

Where should the unfortunate go who had been exiled from the community by a princely decree? To the Murman railroad or into the lead mines? There was damnation here in Asia —

After all, one could bear a little disappointment. There was not much communal feeling, not much brotherly love, there was only flattery toward the higher-ups, a little servility, some of them, out of their own free will, licked the shoes of the command, but all this wasn't so terrible. Joseph Body had been right: these men had merely been transplanted, they had not been grafted. It was good to be in the fold, it was advisable to stay the way they were, one couldn't very well risk the Murman railroad.

As a matter of fact, there was complete freedom in the camp. What of it that the officers' meeting had prohibited the word of honor? They might have accepted it just as easily. And what if they had accepted it? They couldn't go out in this cold anyway, it was fifty-five below. And it really did not make much difference why they did not go out. What mattered was that they did not. There was equality in the camp and no one blocked the way of spiritual development. There even was freedom of the press, every one could spread his thoughts without restriction. There was no press anyway and what thoughts could any one want to spread? There was equality but Goldegg bought perfumes rather than anything else, while Kajaba spent his money on preserves. Goldegg liked to dress well, others liked their bellies. The pay was the same to everybody, everybody could spend it the way he pleased, Schenck, for instance, bought himself a guitar, Rademacher a big ball, Keledi, skates, Wanderer, a Russian grammar.

The command gave proof of its sense of justice, too. There was, for instance, the case of First Lieutenant Kayser. No, not First Lieutenant, Captain. His wife had written him that, at home, he had already received his promotion. One morning, his orderly brought him the condensed milk and the canned coffee but the First Lieutenant did not like something about them and he said so and the orderly, so it was said, talked back to him. Anyway, the orderly did not let it go at that. Whereupon First Lieutenant Kayser leapt from his bed and slapped the chap twice in the face.

In judging the affair, the command was very just. First Lieutenant Kayser was reprimanded in the orders of the day, and the command also warned the officers not to permit themselves to go to extremes. Bodily punishment was not permitted even at home, consequently, its use was not justified here either. In fact, it was even less permissible here than at home because the only thing that sustained them was discipline. Over and above this, First Lieutenant Kayser was sentenced to confinement in his room for two days. This proved materially that the command was extremely fair. On the other hand, thanks to the confessions of eye-witnesses, it was proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that the orderly had actually talked back, consequently, the command withdrew his assignment as an orderly. He was detailed to the privates outside of the camp. Now he would find out for himself whether it was better to beg crumbs of bread on the bank of the Ussuri or faithfully to serve his superiors in the good warm camp.

Indeed, he was not even serving his superiors, he was merely doing military service. And everybody had to do this without complaint. If he had a complaint, he could have trusted the command. Through First Lieutenant Körös, he could have asked for another assignment and, provided his request was justified, and provided that there had been a possibility of fulfilling it, his request would have been granted. The sentence, however, was merely temporary. For the time being, only a deposition was drawn up. To become valid, it had to wait for the consent of the authorities at home.

A great sensation soon overshadowed all Lavka-news, all events. Mr. Novák began his activities and a poster in the study announced that the first number of the Agitator, a humorous publication, would be published that day. The poster also informed them in what sequence the various rooms would get the paper. The Siberian Gazette published only serious essays and editorials in the style of government-subsidized papers at home, but the Agitator — well — it was going to be a funny sheet, there would be pictures in it, and jokes, it would be quite different from the other one. The command took no responsibility for it, for if it had, it would have been mentioned in the orders of the day, and the fact that it did not, excited them even more. The news trickled out that Baron Fest was the illustrator. Editor-in-Chief Novák was publishing in it a long short story by Heltai which he had written from memory. For the time being, it would be given to every room for one hour only, but later it would go the round of the rooms again and then there would be plenty of time to read it more carefully.

But some of them could not wait for it and they darted up to the second floor where it was already being read. In a few seconds Cornet Gönczy hurried down, out of breath, bringing the first verse of one of its poems. The poem was written by Aspirant Zsigmond and its spirit was radically different from what had hitherto permeated the press of the camp. Cornet Gönczy stepped onto a chair and began to read it:

When you walk in the yard,
Your hand's like a machine:
Right and left you salute,
To your utter chagrin.
You don't dare move about,
For if you merely stir,
There's already on your neck:
A senior officer.
Many are the arguments,
Many are the blunders,
But even more numerous are:
The senior officers.
And when the Red Cross sends you something,
Cry, poor sufferer!
Everything's snapped up
By the senior officer.

They greeted with exuberant yells, this the first revolutionary fruit of eastern Siberian literature. Never before had the lyre of a prisoner of war sent a poem so courageous and so brave soaring toward the skies....

CHAPTER XLVII

BARON FEST drew loose ladies and gentlemen in civilian clothes in the Agitator and the characters said amusing things to each other. Some of the prisoners said that it was at least as good as Le Rire. There were drawings in the Siberian Gazette, too, but Maestro Barócsi drew only landscapes, soldiers' graves and symbols about their Chain, and Associate Editor Gabriel Farkas wrote such poems as:

"O you imprisoned souls, suffering in the depths of jails —"

The Agitator was nearer to their hearts than the official bulletin with its essays, it was nearer than the Siberian Gazette whose publication was regularly announced in the orders of the day. The Agitator did not say a word about the depths of prisons, nothing of sufferings, but they said that its numbers would be deposited in the Hungarian National Museum so that future generations should see how their ancestors writhed in captivity. The Agitator spoke of what the men did not speak of, but what lived and burned in every one of them: it spoke of women, there were knees in it, curly locks, women's shoes and ladies' hats and female hips. Most of them were drawn in profile, their breasts thus appeared to better advantage. Baron Fest, to be sure, could draw people only in profile and even then only from right to left. All the women in the Agitator looked from right to left. The command could not set itself against the unanimous enthusiasm of the common folk. They smiled benevolently. Let them play, let them amuse themselves. But it was always on the lookout, it sensed that suppressed emotions, hidden thoughts, were exploding in the Agitator and although benevolent smiles were all right for the time being, nevertheless, it was advisable to be on the lookout. In Paris, too, it had begun thus. At first they had sung doggerel, then they had charged the Bastille, then —

Lieutenant Jóni, before he had surrendered his field-glass to the Russians, had taken a lens out of it, and now this lens was going from hand to hand. They were looking through this magnifying lens at Baron Fest's drawings, at the masterpieces looking to the left. Thus they tried madly to bring nearer to themselves the Holy Courtesan. This poor, starving army would have readily bled to death for these little ladies drawn in red and blue carrying bags in their left hands given to them by the uhlan who was both a mathematician and an artist.

In half an hour, the whole camp knew the poem about the senior officer by heart. A musician by the name of Hoppe was already setting it to music. He promised to have it ready by the next day. Then he would whistle it to them. It would be a certain hit. Beyond the Ussuri and the Amur, in Khabarovsk, the hit of the season would be Hoppe's song.

Captain Benkö, that pleasant-looking, tanned hussar captain, was openly in favor of the Agitator. Whenever possible, he liked to annoy the Major, who belonged to the Commons. Consequently, he went to battle for the freedom of the press and sided with the editors of the Agitator. He said that, from the point of view of the Honvéds, there was nothing in it he could take exception to. He said that the Commons was still dominated by the spirit of Metternich. He did not hesitate to say so in so many words to Dr. Béla Elek, Editor-in-Chief of the Siberian Gazette, who was considerably downhearted because he felt that the hegemony of his editorial box was now broken into two. He told the Captain that it would be advisable to take into consideration the fact that, from the point of view of the younger elements, this paper addressed to the baser emotions and full of sensual drawings would be a damaging influence. The Captain firmly declared that every expression of cultural activities filled him with joy and the younger elements, since they had been permitted to fight on the front, deserved to get acquainted with life too. One could not always feed them with fairy-tales about the stork.

The controversy was hardly settled when other sensational news spread in the camp. Novák had finished Ferenc Molnár's play "The Lawyer" and the parts were already being copied by diligent hands. The play was to be presented very soon. Theater: temple of culture. This was a serious thing, the command could not possibly take exception to it. The male characters had already been selected, they only needed players for the women's rôles, and as soon as the theater could be thoroughly organized, other plays would also be presented. One prisoner had "Cyclamen," by Andor Gábor, and an Imperial German officer had "Typhoon," by Melchior Lengyel. All they had to do was to translate "Typhoon" back into the Hungarian from the German. There would be superb performances, so Novák said, and there would be vaudeville also.

Indeed, the command was wholly in favor of the project and although there were no advance announcements in the orders of the day, huge crowds gathered in the study around a poster the next day. Aspirant Sándor Novák hung the poster but he did not sign the announcement with his rank but thus: Director of the Theater. The announcement called on those of the younger gentlemen who considered themselves good enough to play musical or dramatic rôles. Conditions: pleasant voice, good appearance, therefore only those should report who fulfilled the conditions. At the entrance examination, only members of the Drama Committee would be permitted to be present, at three o'clock in the afternoon the next day, in the study.

The comrades were requested to avoid the study at that hour, in the interest of the noble project. The chairman of the Drama Committee was Captain Benkö, its members, the editorial staffs of the papers and the organizers of the theater. Only those would be admitted to the presence of the Drama Committee who first passed the Argus-eyed Director. Decisions would be rendered after a conference between the Director and the Drama Committee.

Great excitement reigned in the camp and they were all trying to guess who would be favored. They measured each other with judicious eyes. Perhaps Sluka, he is a good-looking chap, although we don't know what characteristics the Committee will take into consideration. Here is, for instance, Fedák's case, they say she looks frightful offstage, and you know how pretty she looks behind the footlights. Or perhaps beauty isn't important at all. Then here is Goldegg, the fellow whose smile is so affected and feminine and who always pours perfume all over himself, then here is the model of the artists, that curly-haired, gypsy-looking boy, but the fact that he is a good model does not necessarily mean that he will be good as an actress. Or perhaps the voice isn't important at all. Oh, yes, these are all Austrians. They don't speak Hungarian. That's too bad.

That evening, they were not interested in Simi Grosz's reports concerning the Po Valley, nor in our considerable advance along the Ivka. They stared with glistening eyes into the air, they stayed up very long, no one was yelling; Macht Ruhe, they argued lively and merrily, the entirel was intoxicated, the Agitator's free and luscious women were before their eyes, everybody knew them by name by this time. The one with the little stub nose, whose hair was painted with yellow crayon, was christened Ilka, a little plump one whose hair Baron Fest drew with India ink was referred to as Fanny.

The decision of the Drama Committee came as a great surprise. A long, gaunt cornet was the victor, a chap by the name of Lakner. A tall, freckled, hawk-nosed, sparse-haired country teacher with a whining voice. The Drama Committee decided to make him the heroine. Udvardy's selection was also surprising, they wouldn't even have thought that he dared compete. This Udvardy was a limping pseudo-cornet, an elderly fellow with a hoarse, cracked voice. How was he going to dance? His leg was shot off at Brest-Litovsk, he had been limping since. What rôles would he get? Was he going to create only limping women, even though the rôles did not call for such?

Steve Nagy was all right. A pleasant-looking lad, but, they said, he would have small rôles only. Chambermaids. A friend, a lady of society. Things of that sort. Then there was little Hromadnik. Perfectly incredible. Sickly-looking, dwarfish, but of course, you couldn't interfere. They were the experts, they knew what they were doing.

They didn't care for Lavka-news those days. Yes, peace. They knew that. Yes, peace before noon. Or, at the most, before nightfall. Yet if it had not come for so long it might as well wait until the première.

The heroine, Leo Lakner, they called Leona Lakner, Hromadnik was baptized Cinka, the Nagy boy, Ica, Udvardy got no girl's name. He was spoken of as Aunt Udvardy.

At some other time it would have created quite an uproar, but now they acknowledged quite indifferently the fact that the Siberian Gazette announced a contest for a short story to commemorate the triumphant fights of the Honvéds. First prize: five rubles; second prize, three rubles; third prize: two rubles. Every entry to be published in the Gazette. The title of the story to be "The Heroic Honvéd." The prizes have been put at the disposal of the Editor by Captain John Benkö. Everybody was convinced, however, that Captain Benkö had given the money long before the Agitator and the theater appeared on the scene. Now he would give the money to the theater instead.

Heroic Honvéd, well, you heroic Honvéd, how about the women? Captain Benkö gave a banquet in honor of the women that evening and the lucky ones who were invited feasted until the wee hours of the morning.

The commander of the Honvéds brought out his jealously guarded treasure: four bottles of wine, and put them on the table in honor of the artists. Anent this festive occasion, he drank a toast to the dawn of Hungarian Art in prison.

Later he confessed the secret of the wine and the illustrious "those present" learned that the wine was made of raisins which had been fermented with water and sugar in an empty oil-can for several weeks. Then came the harvest, that is to say, the raisins were squeezed out. It was a good, strong wine, it made you drunk rather quickly.

Editor Elek was also present, and he was discoursing quite frankly with Director Novák. He said that the theater could always count on the press. The theater was a strong fort of culture and henceforward they would walk hand in hand toward the glorious goal.

CHAPTER XLVIII

IT seemed that the Agitator and the Captive Officers' Theater would create a new spirit in the camp. That freedom of the press and freedom on the boards would counterbalance the rule of severe discipline and conservative principles. The Regulars would have to realize that, in the field of creative art, the civilians were not to be despised, and that, in fact, camp culture and camp art rested solely on their shoulders. Many of the Regulars regarded the theater with great interest. Of course, when talking about the Regulars, one didn't include such men as Baron Fest, who had broken with conservatism a long time ago and had been studying mathematics, who was now drawing for the Agitator, and who shared the opinion of the opposition more often than that of the command. It seemed the theater was the seed from which the tree of a new freedom would rise. There were fields now where the civilians were the experts, where regulations and discipline could not prune life. Where public opinion was unanimous. The theater needed carpenters, painters and scenic designers, electricians, technical personnel, wigmakers, dressers, and, above all, dressmakers. One couldn't very well say that such work was unworthy of an officer, thus the principle that an officer could not do any manual labor was slightly altered. This work was an exception. This work was permitted. More, it was necessary. One could possibly dismiss the Agitator with a benevolent smile, but the theater had to be recognized, the budget had to be laid before the officers' meeting, and it went through by a unanimous vote.

This slowly growing liberty suddenly received a cold shower one day. The adjutant read a communication from the command informing them that Countess Kinsky had arrived from home and that, in her round of visits among the camps on the Amur, she would also visit this one. She would arrive to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock, and in order to discuss the details of the reception and other matters in connection with her arrival, there would be a special officers' meeting at seven in the morning.

All agreed that the Countess should be asked for a large donation to help the theater, although the news pushed the theater in the background for a while. From letters sent to them from other camps they had known that the Countess was paying out loans which would have to be paid back only at home, that the Countess would take messages home, that she would listen to complaints. Otherwise they were wholly at sea. Nevertheless, the camp was burning with great excitement: news from home, a living person from home, a gentle look from an aristocratic woman in the name of those at home! Aspirant Molitoris, who was just sewing a rent in his tunic, stopped his work at once and ripped it open again. He said he would be crazy if he would do another stitch. He would step before the Countess in his tattered tunic and ask for a new one. He would be crazy to sew now. Some began to write long letters. Cornet Schnabel said that the Countess had estates near his home town, it was possible that she knew his wife, and in that case he hoped to get an explanation as to how it had been possible for his wife to bear a child, although he had been away six years, and whether there were no measures against such outrages.

The command was together in full force. First Lieutenant Haertl, a little, black Austrian who was wholeheartedly hated by all and sundry, walked among them with a mysterious mien, smiling sardonically. This Haertl was a reservist, but, at the same time, he was the most pedantic and the most zealous satellite of the command. He was Public Prosecutor in some little Austrian town and it was true that he was greatly against every form of laxity and was always for extremely strict measures in the Welfare Committee, of which he was chairman.

An officers' meeting brought nothing new. The commander spoke in brief, soldierly fashion of the great event. He gave curt instructions: if the Countess favored somebody by speaking to him, he must answer briefly and not take up any one's else time. There would be a dinner in honor of the Countess and the Philharmonic Orchestra which had been organized in the meantime would play. Every room would be represented by one gentleman. No one should ask for anything individually because all requests would be presented by the command and they would ask only things in the interest of the entire community. Everybody should tidy his clothes, and those who deliberately appeared in ragged clothes and expecting to gain undeserved advantages, would not share in the gifts, which would be distributed with justice. Complaints against the Russian command had already been collected and those would also be handed over to the Countess. If, however, their hopes should be thwarted and the aristocratic Red Cross lady should bring nothing tangible, even then she would bring something: she would bring an atmosphere of home, she would bring messages from home, her shoes touched the soil of the Fatherland, and for this they ought to give thanks to the Almighty. We ought to be grateful to the Countess for having undertaken this dangerous journey, full of a thousand perils, for us: prisoners in a distant land.

There was washing and tidying, shaving and brushing, and Aspirant Molitoris feverishly sewed up again the rent in his tunic although he had, in the meantime, considerably enlarged it. A few minutes before eleven, messengers hurried to the rooms, warned the prisoners to be ready, and at eleven, sharp, the sound of the bell was heard from the direction of the gate —

The Russian guards threw open the gates and Countess Kinsky stepped across the threshold of the camp with the Russian colonel and Waletzky and the commanders of the neighboring camps and a few Russian officers of high rank. Our own command, headed by Major Steiner, waited for her before the door. He was surrounded by First Lieutenant Haertl, representing the Welfare Committee, the room commanders, adjutants, newspaper-readers, translators, the commander of the orderly room, the senior officer of every branch of the armed forces headed by the commander-in-chief of the Honvéds, Captain Benkö, the senior officer of the Tyrolese Yagers, the senior of the Imperial Germans, uhlans, cavalrymen, guardsmen, and the senior officer of the captive officers of the Imperial Ottoman Army, a Bimbashi, as the Turks called the majors.

After a short speech of greeting, the Countess entered the first room. The captive officers stood at the foot of their beds, in rigid "at attention" and as she entered they all looked at her.

. . . She was a living woman, a Countess, a live woman, with a black veil, in a short skirt, in a genuine Parisian skirt, she wasn't an ugly old woman, she was young and pretty, full of charm, of divine grace, she was one radiating marvel, the Countess, she was a live woman, the Countess —

The whole room was suddenly filled with Countess-scent, with Princess-scent, she spread about fragrance like a wondrous flower and everything on her was from another world, her low shoes, her stockings, her handkerchief, her hair, at least as much of it as protruded from beneath her coif. Her ornamental Red Cross decorations, they were all so feminine, so regal —

She was like an angel who had come down from the heavens or perhaps from even farther away and she had a maddening, intoxicating lure, and all hearts were filled with the miracle. Thus Joan of Arc must have appeared to the French when they followed her to death —

Long-lost feminine eyes, long-forgotten curve of female lips, black veil, holy black veil floating behind her, and she started to speak and one couldn't know what she would say, one just listened transfigured, one listened to it as if it had been a sigh —

Shoes, let us drink out of you, arm, let us rest our eyes on you, hair, let us kiss you with our eyes —

Holy courtesan and holy mother, you are one now, permit us to fall at your feet in reverence —

The Countess smiled, stopped in a soldierly manner at one end of the room and looked at the prisoners, at all of them simultaneously —

CHAPTER XLIX

THE Countess nodded with that dear, black-curled head of hers, on which there was that black veil, and on the black veil there was a white stripe with a little red cross, and warmth filled the hearts. No wonder that people died for such aristocratic ladies. No one had to be sorry because the moment was worth the whole Siberian journey and those who had the Gold Medal for Bravery might even hope for a kiss —

The Countess nodded, then she went around the room, and she shook hands with everybody, but, of course, there wasn't much time, she shook hands in a hurry, alas, there wasn't time for everybody to kiss her hand.

Then she went back to her former place at the end of the room, where the General Staff was waiting for her, and she opened her lips:

"I am bringing you greetings from home, you brave, unfortunate soldiers, I am bringing you greetings from His Imperial and Royal Majesty who has since, alas, died. Gloriously reigning Francis Joseph I always spoke with paternal love of his captive officers. His command to you was that you bear your fate patiently and with resignation, and in the knowledge that the circumstances which brought about your capture would be considered with kindness and sympathy. His command was that you do not try to escape because such efforts only made the position of the others more difficult and grave and because they rarely were successful. I have to submit to you very disheartening news. His Majesty, the German Emperor, sends you no greetings. His Majesty does not recognize captive officers. His Majesty will again acknowledge them only after they are properly rehabilitated — "

It was decidedly not nice of Baron Fest. In this moving and exalted moment, when country teachers and dealers in lumber and chemists and bookkeepers and lawyers and professors and clerks stood there in enthusiastic "at attention," when one heard with joy that the Kaiser sent no greetings to the Germans, that their impertinence would now be broken for a while, but that we, we had greetings from the dead King, Baron Fest shouldn't have murmured:

"Well, and how about the Sultan? What's the Sultan's message?"

Fortunately, the Countess was standing at the other end of the room and so she did not hear Baron Fest's question. And her speech was over and she was already at the door. The Major signaled to them to start cheering, and the whole bunch of them broke into loud cheers, and the Countess-apparition was already on her way to the other rooms.

And in half an hour, they saw her going with the General Staff to the study where the tables were already laid for dinner. The Russians had already gone away. They heard that she would have dinner here but that, after dinner, the Russians would come back for her and then they would go to the two other camps. Lavka-news had it that there was a superb dinner prepared in honor of the Countess. They said they had succeeded in discovering a pig which had not been fed on salmon, that pig would be served now. And there were other things, too, some said that there also was a real cake. Many hung around the study as if they had something to attend to there. The orchestra played for the first time that day, they had been practicing for weeks in secret. Some of them were anxious to hear how the orchestra sounded. They came back and reported that it was marvelous, the bass viol was especially fine. They were extremely proud of that fact, because the bass viol had been made by Dantsek, it was a camp product. Every minute brought news. The Countess liked the bass viol very much, she would give money to Dantsek to buy new materials, also some money to the camp as a whole for musical instruments. There came news that rotten Haertl had ordered a memorial for the Countess; a student of architecture by the name of Erkulencz, had drawn it — it was a beautiful thing. The Countess was deeply moved but Haertl reserved the glory for the memorial for himself and Erkulencz was not even invited to the dinner. They said that they served champagne and fine wines at the dinner, but all this was not authentic. There was only one hope of learning everything: Captain Benkö. As commander-in-chief of the Honvéds, he was present at the dinner, and they could count on him to tell. At last, around two o'clock, the dinner was over and the Russians were already coming to fetch the Countess, and then one could see that there was something mysterious about the whole dinner, because only the superior officers had been present and not the room commanders. Only the trustworthy elements had attended it. Thus, for instance, Czernin, and Goldegg, too, although neither of them was a room commander. The Countess had gone and now at last they could get hold of Captain Benkö who declared emphatically that they would have to look out. Captain Benkö said that they wouldn't trust even him and many things were not discussed when he had been within earshot. It was quite sure by now that the Countess had brought huge sums with her and large consignments of various things, including cloth, were at her disposal. For the time being the announcement would be made that they could write letters and all that sort of thing, but they had to be on the lookout, because she would come back. There would be general and special requests, general and special gifts, and he would do everything in his power to aid the officers.

The Countess was hardly gone when the officers' meeting was called. Everybody raced to the meeting, everybody listened more carefully to the Major's words than at other times. They hung on his dignified yet soldierly words.

"The Countess will take home a huge sheet on which everybody may write a ten-word message. She will take this home personally and mail it to the addresses. The Countess has got in touch with Consuls Heedbloom and Conger who will bring large quantities of clothes and other necessities. It isn't quite sure yet just what and how much, but there will come a large consignment of Chinese blankets and Chinese boots, furthermore, small things, such as scissors, shaving soap, nail-brushes, dental cream, and there will be also a chance to get sweaters and various other indispensable articles. The camp will also get chocolate, dried fruit, fruit preserves, the last named probably only for the sick. The Countess will deposit certain sums for the officers' orchestra, the officers' church, the officers' cultural association and the officers' theater and although this is not strictly speaking our business it is worthy of mention that the ranks will also get certain sums so that at Christmas time, which is quite near now, every orderly will get a small package and twenty kopecks in cash, also a few lumps of sugar and insect powder.

"The Countess has given us utmost encouragement regarding the fact that upon our return to the Fatherland the circumstances of our capture will be most humanely considered. The success of the rehabilitation, of course, will greatly depend on the officers' behavior in captivity. The authorities suppose that those officers who were good soldiers in prison also did their duty when they were before the enemy. Everybody may be assured that the command has his interests at heart, consequently, it is useless for anybody to try to escape and thus attempt to prove that he tried everything to get away and that it was not his fault that he was captured. Await calmly the liberating peace which, the Countess has told us in great secret, is not far away. I cannot say anything more about this just at the moment but I hope this will be satisfactory to the gentlemen.

"The Countess furthermore permitted us to submit to her a few general requests but only such as are in the interest of the entire camp, and only three at the most. The command will, of course, utilize this opportunity and we shall decide at this meeting what these requests shall be.

"Over and above all these, the Countess will distribute loans. But I warn you, don't borrow too much because your family will have to pay it back. At the latest, these loans will have to be repaid upon our return home. Take care, therefore, and those who do not absolutely need it, should not ask for a loan. The sum is limited, and don't forget there are many prisoners who are in an even worse position than we are. As far as I am concerned, I believe that fifty rubles should be the maximum amount.

"The Countess will soon be back from the other camps and it is possible that we shall have to submit our requests yet to-day. Therefore, I shall adjourn the meeting for ten minutes, to give you a chance to think them over. The Command leaves it to the gentlemen to decide upon them. The propositions will be decided by a majority vote."

Nerves were strained to the utmost. Here was a kind fairy princess and she just simply told them to make three wishes, exactly as it was in the fairy-tale. The mere promise that there would be cloth and American shoes and sweaters and nail-brushes and help for the theater was very nice but to make three wishes which were in the interest of the entire camp, to wish for that which they most wanted — What could they wish for when day after day one went to bed with heavier and heavier heart and more and more pain, when one was near the Yellow Sea, when there was wife at home, and child, and father, and mother, and brother? There were courtyards at home and tables and pillows and there were no officers' meetings at home and no setting-up exercises were threatening them at home. Couldn't we ask, for instance, that we should be sent home? And if we couldn't ask for that, what was the reason for all the other requests? It was as if a drowning man were permitted to wish for anything except to be put ashore.

Some of them, especially a short, bespectacled aspirant, contended that we should ask the Countess to help the ranks. The ranks —

"The gentlemen may ask only for themselves. They have no right to ask anything for any other camp, any other detachment or any other group. The requests to be made must be in the interest of this camp. The gentlemen should not forget this — "

Then we ought to ask a little freedom at least, we ought to ask the Countess to intervene in our favor with the Russians to let us give them our word of honor and then we could go for walks.

"This, on the other hand, we can do without the Countess. And we decided not to give them our word of honor."

CHAPTER L

THE ten minutes were up. It occurred to some one that we should ask for books. Major Steiner overheard it and he immediately declared that this request might as well be dropped because the Countess had already mentioned that the camp would get several books through the Swedish Red Cross. Most of them would be German books, of course, it's very difficult to get Hungarian books, but the prisoners had plenty of time on hand and it would be only to their advantage to acquire a thorough command of the German language. It was to be hoped that Hungarian books would also arrive. Certain steps were taken in this direction at home, but it would take very much time to organize this action, consequently we should not be impatient about it for it would show us up in a very bad light, in the fourth year of our imprisonment, for the Hungarian prisoners of war, as if not expecting to be released very soon, to ask for such things.

Lieutenant Jungsmann, a stocky little Czech with a snub-nose, proposed that they should ask the Countess to intervene and procure for them more days on which desserts would be served. Once a week isn't enough. Especially the Czechs who, at home, were used to the famous Czech knödels, suffered a lot from too much fish. He didn't want to make a nationalistic question out of it, therefore it was not absolutely important that there should be knödels, nevertheless, it was the least they could ask. Dessert should be served at least twice a week, and if he might express his wish, he would suggest that one of the two dessert days should be devoted to knödels —

All of us were suddenly filled with nausea for salmon and the officers' meeting accompanied Lieutenant Jungsmann's proposition with approving murmur. A captain wrapped in a Chinese blanket, whose three golden stars were sewed on even to the blanket, fought his way to Jungsmann and said to the lieutenant, who was blushing with excitement:

"Bravo!"

The proposition was very popular and one could not take any exception to it from a military point of view, while from a civilian point of view, it was simply perfect. Major Steiner put the proposition to a vote and the first request was unanimously carried. Followed the second request. After a short silence, Jungsmann, flushed and excited, stepped forward again.

"Sixty-five per cent of the camp, that is to say, the absolute majority, like to skate. The orderlies cannot be used to carry water to the rink because there are several of them who have only one master interested in skating while the two others are not. Because of the constant arguments, the officers' meeting declared some two years ago that to carry water to the skating rink is a work permissible to an officer and ever since the officers have carried their own water to the rink. But the time to solve this problem has at last arrived. Perhaps we could ask through the Countess that the Russian colonel should detail Russian soldiers to carry the water. Of course, they will be paid for it."

They confessed that the suggestion was utterly stupid. There had never been any trouble because of the water. People had been carrying water for money, if not the Russians, then the Chinese, but since no one could offer anything better in the way of suggestions and because they did not want to make propositions which would fail, this suggestion was also carried.

There was one more request left. Here was a chance to correct all the faults. One last request, and into that they must concentrate all their pain, all their complaints. In that last request they must present the real, the bleeding picture of the camp. All the tears, all the burning desires of the Siberian exiles must go into it.

They felt the unusual import of the moment; if they missed this chance, it would never again return. Everything might be corrected yet, everything fixed up, there was still one more request left, there was one more chance to turn back the wheel of fate — They gazed ahead of them, darkly and dismally, they looked, with tears in their eyes, through the icy window, toward the invisible barbed-wire fences hidden from them by the Siberian winter's frost settling on the window-panes —

The solemn silence was broken by Jungsmann. They somehow felt that whatever the ambitious Jungsmann would say would not be the right thing but they also knew, with the certainty of experienced gamblers, that Jungsmann had a "series." Jungsmann had a "lucky series" and they couldn't fight against that. Jungsmann was "in it," Jungsmann had managed to get the upper hand in this historical moment, he grabbed the lead over the head of the mob. Jungsmann dictated and even the Major obeyed him. Jungsmann had become a dictator. This little, fat man divined the spirit of the times. They looked with hatred at the little man with the big belly, but they knew that in an instant they would second his motion, they would follow him —

Jungsmann was already explaining in a superior manner that the superb chance to settle the affairs of honor had arrived. The Countess should be asked to take the cartels and depositions home with her. Thus everybody could be assured that, when the time to settle the matter should arrive, his papers would be safe and kept in order, and, in the most urgent cases, they might even receive a decision while still in prison.

Regulars and reservists equally felt that Jungsmann was squandering the last chance, that he was mowing down the last green blade of hope, that he was leading them to the Waterloo of their secret dreams and mad expectations, that they were marching to Sedan with the little fat man, but they couldn't do anything against him.

Sadly and broken and unanimously, they voted Jungsmann's third request. . . .

CHAPTER LI

THE Countess returned to the camp according to schedule, but there was no festive reception now. She did not even announce when she would arrive, she went straight to the room of the commander and they learned that she had arrived only when the adjutant went from room to room and discreetly called away certain gentlemen. The Ambassador's nephew was called away, that Lieutenant Czernin, and Lieutenant von Goldegg, too, and several cavalry officers. Captain Benkö did not wait to be called, he put on his gold-braided dress-coat and went. First Lieutenant Pick was also called away and this caused considerable amazement, but it filled the Jews with satisfaction. There were two Picks in the camp, the first lieutenant, and the poor Pick who was a private and who was permitted in the camp only on account of his illness, after he had proved that he had a degree from a law college. This poor Pick was a very modest and very courteous man. He did not deny that in spite of his fifty years, his children and his degree he was still an assistant county clerk in some small village. The other Pick, the rich Pick, was a jovial, big, fat man, full of freckles, with loads of money at home. He must have had a lot, because even from the prison camp he constantly sent instructions to his various businesses. He claimed to have lumberyards in Slavonia and this must have been true because he had a bookkeeper in the camp to whom he paid a regular salary and who took care of his correspondence. Every prisoner was permitted to write a letter once a week, but First Lieutenant Pick bought up the rights to write and having notified his family of this, he sent them off with different signatures so that the Russians should not notice the many cards signed by Pick. An intelligent private was First Lieutenant Pick's bookkeeper, because no officer would accept a job with salary. He lived very well and addressed every officer as "Mein Kind." He was a very religious man and there was a twisted loaf on his table every Friday night. It was made in Khabarovsk, especially for Mr. Pick, by a Chinaman to whom it had been explained with great difficulty what the rich Pick wanted. His table was laid with white cloth, after every luncheon he had a demi-tasse, smoked a cigar, had a half-hour's nap, and then, just as he had been used to doing at home, he played cards until tea-time with a couple of poor devils to whom he loaned money so that they should have something to lose.

The rich Pick obviously lived very well in the camp. All he had to worry about were his businesses. Every evening when he went to bed he read the last issue of the Primorskaya Zhizn, which was brought to the camp especially for him. He had known a little Croatian and in a few months he spoke Russian fluently. He always had money. It was said that when he was captured there were huge sums on him, but he had been receiving fantastic sums from home ever since. Lately, for instance, he had ordered for himself a body-warmer from Khabarovsk.

There were no great social differences in the camp because everybody regularly received his pay but the gamblers and the drunks were often short and these composed First Lieutenant Pick's court. These were the poor devils with whom Pick played cards. Why the poor Pick was so poor no one knew. Apparently he was very much accustomed to poverty and to saving and that's why he dared not spend money here either, nor participate in anything. Perhaps he was afraid that one day he might be expelled from the camp and he was saving for this emergency. He always sighed deeply when he looked at the preserves and the cakes from town, he used to stop by the boxes and say sadly, with bitter envy and melancholy helplessness in his tone:

"I can't afford those things — "

When they made collections, they didn't even go to the poor Pick, but the rich Pick was always visited first and he gave almost as much as the entire camp together. He gave gladly, with jovial smiles on his lips, he was the chief Mæcenas of the camp. He gave for church, for short-story contests, for the Agitator, and always encouraged those who made the collections.

The conference lasted a long time and nothing oozed out from the locked room. They couldn't hope that Haertl or Czernin would give away anything. On the other hand Baron Fest wasn't even invited. Apparently the aristocracy had given him up completely. But Captain Benkö would certainly tell everything. Once he even opened the door and was about to leave the conference; he looked very angry, he must have got in a scrap in there, but then a velvety female voice called after him, "But please, Captain," whereupon he went back.

The Countess came out of the room accompanied by von Goldegg. They talked in French. They were deeply lost in the conversation, the Countess not even looking at the prisoners who stood there pale as corpses, whose uncertain and far-away hopes were now slowly but with deadly certainty fleeing from the camp, after the disappearing veil of the Countess's hood —

There was nothing to be done now but to go to Captain Benkö. Incidentally, Editor Elek was deeply insulted because he, as editor of the official paper, had not been invited. But Captain Benkö went straight to him, to the reed-walled editorial rooms, and he began to talk without waiting for anybody to ask him, this was good because Editor Elek being insulted would not have questioned him anyway.

Captain Benkö waited for a few minutes until the box was crowded to overflowing and then he began:

"Just imagine, I wanted to get out, I wanted to leave the whole bunch of them because they began to address me as first lieutenant. I said that if I am only a first lieutenant then the Major is only a captain. That's why I wanted to leave them. But I don't regret going back. To be sure the Countess called me back. Then they said. 'Let's drop the question,' and they did but from that moment on they addressed me as captain. It's incredible how selfish people are. Here is that sissy-looking Goldegg for instance. His greatest trouble is that he doesn't regularly receive L'Illustration. The Countess put it down that it should be sent regularly, whereupon I remarked, just out of fun, that what I missed most was red breeches. I don't like to walk around in green trousers, it's a shame for a hussar to wear them. Imagine, boys, she put it down! She said she would take care of it. Then I told her to take care of the color, because the Russian color is no good, our red was different, I don't want cerise, I want red. She said she knew very well the difference, she would be very careful about it. Everybody will get money, the institutions will get money, you will get some, every one of you. Everybody may ask for fifty rubles. But when one's credit is good for more, he may ask for more, provided the command recommends it. Right there and then they took out a sheet of paper, we signed them right away and the Major approved of them. I asked for two hundred only, but Pick put himself down for six thousand and so did Szmrecsányi. At first it was said that the rankers who are with us here, would get only thirty rubles, and even then only when some one vouched for them, whereupon Pick said that he would vouch for all of them and for fifty rubles. Now they are also going to get fifty rubles. Too bad that this idea came to Pick first, I would also have vouched for them, there are only three of them anyway. Haertl, of course, whined and wanted everything for the Welfare but I told him to keep quiet. There will be gifts too, but only later. That will be settled with Conger and Heedbloom, the Consuls at Khabarovsk and Vladivostok. Don't be downhearted, boys — everything will turn out all right. I offer hereby ten rubles for the Siberian Gazette, ten rubles for the theater — don't be afraid — "

In a few seconds, the camp was excitedly commenting on the incident, especially the Goldegg affair came in for much roasting. Of course, no one could say anything against the six thousand rubles. They were rich people, they knew what they wanted. Some of them said that Szmrecsányi wanted to buy a fine Siberian fur-coat, and as far as Pick was concerned, well, he might have gotten it anyway, only a couple of weeks later. And vouching for the poor ones was certainly something in his favor. Fifty rubles were enough, no one would ask for more. After all, the command was not so bad. But wait, Captain Benkö had said nothing about the requests. How about the two dessert days? They rushed back to Benkö who said the requests were damn foolish but the Countess liked them very much. She had said that the taking home of the affairs of honor had been requested in every camp which she had visited and therefore she would place that first. Then, she had said, it had been a good idea to ask for such things. There would be no trouble in fulfilling them, except perhaps the two dessert days, yet on the other hand, it would greatly calm their relatives at home to see that on the whole they were not suffering so greatly.

Gratitude to the command, gratitude and tenderness for the dear, good Countess overpowered them. For the Countess who had come to far-away Siberia, who had brought them the blessings of the home sun, the home soil and the home fields, who had waved before them, for a second, the hope of liberation.

There were ironical remarks heard from some of the boxes, but these were completely disregarded. After all, one could not very well get excited over the facts that Haertl would command more power now because of the gifts, that discipline would be more severe, that the command would be more powerful hereafter because more interests were concentrated in its sphere. And she had most probably taken care of the camps for the ranks also. Of course, the privates would not get illustrated French weeklies, that was only natural, but they would get a few packages of charity, the command had said so, they had said something else too but —

The Agitator announced that there would be a special, extra number published the next day. The entire number would be devoted to the Countess. László Sipos, an artist, was already doing the Countess's portrait for the cover.

But that was not so important. What could the Agitator say? Really, nothing much. Apparently it tried to make competition for the Siberian Gazette because the Siberian Gazette also decided to issue an extra number. Most probably both would have pretty cover designs, and a couple of flattering articles about the visit.

The Agitator really came out with the extra issue the next day. It was a very malicious number. Haertl was in it, too, standing guard in front of an iron-barred warehouse full of gifts. Goldegg was drawn in colors. He was lying in a hammock reading L'Illustration. One drawing represented a huge crowd of ragged individuals begging and the Countess was handing them the tail of a salmon. Such things were in it and no one was surprised when the news came at lunch time that the command had confiscated and suppressed the Agitator.

CHAPTER LII

THE visit gave a great impetus to life in the camp. Everybody got the money, those who asked for fifty as well as those who borrowed six thousand. Before the money was distributed, the officers were once more warned that their families would have to pay it back. In the worst case, they would have to repay it after the return. Therefore, few people asked for more than fifty, indeed, there was one officer by the name of Medveczky who had scraped together sixty-four rubles and gave them, all his savings of years, to the Countess to take home to his wife. Every morning and every evening he prayed before the photo of his family. He often told them that they had been living very badly, that he and his wife had often fought, but that he would devote the remaining days of his life to his wife and children. He thought that his family was in great misery, he regretted the life they had led, he declared himself ready to die if only this sacrifice would help them. He didn't borrow anything, God forbid, he didn't want to burden them.

From the day the distribution of money began, the Russian smugglers were working overtime. They were bringing wines, rum and conserves from Khabarovsk. The camp was full of money and one could buy American tobacco and Egyptian cigarettes for very little. They were sold even on credit, on the installment plan, and the installments were to be deducted from the monthly pay. Fine shaving soaps arrived, bottles of Eau de Cologne, nail clippers, sweaters. But this was only the beginning, the command informed them. Clothes in huge quantities would soon arrive. And ready-made overcoats too. They would not have to pay for anything in full, everything would be deducted from their pay. The surplus would go to the Welfare Fund in order to have money at the camp's disposal in case something should happen. If disease or starvation came they would be prepared.

In these days of plenty, they forgot all about the grave attack on the freedom of the press which had come about when the Agitator had been confiscated and suppressed. It was indeed not nice of the Agitator to insult the charitable lady; she really did not deserve such treatment. That drawing with the salmon's tail was negligible, after all, but there was another picture, too, in which a ragged lieutenant was standing before the Countess and he was staring at her with bulging eyes and with saliva dripping from his mouth. And there was this caption below the picture:

COUNTESS: Can I be of any service to you, Lieutenant?

LIEUTENANT (full of desire): Very easily, Countess.

This was the picture and the caption that aroused the ire of the command and the wrath of several members of the General Staff. For the command had already a staff composed of those reliable elements who had been present at the conferences with the Countess. These were now always closeted in the commander's room. It seemed they had become very intimate. Two men, however, refrained from being constantly with them. One of them was, of course, Captain Benkö, the other one was Uncle Szabo, an army physician. Uncle Szabo had a long beard and he was always ready to cure anybody, but he had no office hours. He was always hanging around in the rooms, coming and going and asking them how they felt. Whenever he saw anything suspicious he was immediately there: Anything the matter with you, my son? He could have lived in a separate room, could have snubbed them, but this charming and lively old gentleman was always with them. After lunch, he sat down to play cards with Joska Kaufmann. They began the game by saying a huge number which they put down on paper:

"Three million four hundred and twenty-two thousand nine hundred and forty-two — "

"Yesterday I won from you ninety-four thousand one hundred and twenty — "

Uncle Szabo and Joska Kaufmann had been captured in '14 and they had been playing this endless game ever since. The game was scheduled to end on the day of the armistice and so there was plenty of time to even up the scores. There were considerable losses but the two players were not nervous at all.

Uncle Szabo did not leave his game of casino even on the day the Countess visited the camp. He sat down at his regular hour and solemnly announced the difference in the score between them. Uncle Szabo never attended the meeting of the camarilla, but neither did he give out interviews or speak against them. He cured the sick and played casino with "my son, Joska."

Neither the confiscation of the Agitator nor that queer clique around the command caused any special surprise. It was lucky that they didn't do anything about the theater. After all that was going to be their chief source of entertainment.

The greatest secrecy surrounded the theater until the day of the première. Neither the actresses nor the actors, neither the technical staff nor the employees of the theatrical dressmaking establishment, betrayed anything. They were very secretive and whispered only among themselves. The study was closed now, only those connected with the theater could enter it. They were building a stage there, making furniture, painting sets. The orchestra rehearsed every day and the rumor spread that Conductor Hoppe had composed a special "Siberian Galop" for the festive occasion.

On the day of the première, the orders of the day were read immediately after luncheon. In the evening everybody would be in the theater and this fact was respected even by the command. The orders of the day also informed them that the command had lifted the ban on the Agitator; that certain number, of course, would remain confiscated but, in view of Director Novák's great services performed in the interest of the theater, no reprisals would be taken. The command hoped that, in the future, the Agitator would never overstep the boundaries of decent diversion.

Editor Elek appeared in his box in the afternoon, and asked him to be kind enough to write a review of the performance for the Siberian Gazette. Three articles would deal with the great event. The Editor would write about it as a great cultural event, Associate Editor Farkas would write the criticism, and he was asked to review the première from a literary point of view, with special reference to its mental effect upon the audience.

"Incidentally," said Editor Elek, "here is one of the three passes sent to the editorial staff — Here is yours — "

"Thank you — But isn't the performance free of charge?"

"Of course it is. Why do you ask?"

"Then why the pass?"

"Oh, go on, it doesn't make any difference whether it's free or not, the paper is entitled to passes under all circumstances. That's only natural — "

"Yes, of course."

Ushers with ribbons on their arms received the spectators and led them to their seats. By the time he arrived, the room was crowded. The usher courteously invited him to the first row where there were armchairs only. The others were sitting on their own little stools. Each arrived with a stool under his arm. But he did not have to worry about this. He did not have to worry because there was a seat reserved for him in the first row where the command and the older gentlemen sat. Paper slips were fastened to the backs of the chairs: Major Steiner — Chairman of the Welfare Committee — Commander of the Orderly Room — Regimental Surgeon Dr. Szabó — Captain Benkö — and, at the end of the row, three large signs: Press.

He sat down on one of the chairs reserved for the Press and the orchestra struck up the famous march, Conductor Hoppe's "Siberian Galop." Then the curtains parted and the performance began, the first production of The Captive Officers' Theater. It was "Cyclamen," by Andor Gábor.

Leona Lakner, that gaunt cornet, played the rôle of the heroine. He appeared on the stage in low patent leather shoes, in a blouse cut alluringly low around the throat, and the way he sat down, and the way the heroine's ankles showed and the way he spoke in a low, colorful, and wholly changed voice, and the way he jerked his head when he was kissed, when a kiss followed, a kiss — well, the spectators silently wriggled in their seats. And when Aunt Udvardy came on the stage and began to raise hell in a female voice decked out in huge stuffed breasts, because Aunt Udvardy played a cook, he was simply enchanting. They stared at the stage in rapt attention and every word, every gesture seemed like a charming disappearing souvenir of long-forgotten days. They trembled at the thought that it would be soon over, that the cook's gigantic hips would vanish forever and Leona Lakner too —

The curtain went down and everybody in the room yelled at the top of his voice, from the Major down to the orderlies who had stolen into the room. If it had depended on them, the entire performance would have been repeated right then and there.

"Leona Lakner is an artist, a perfect, superb actress."

"A beauty! Ica Nagy is a perfect beauty. Not even at home was it played so well. It's grand! I saw it in Budapest but — "

He went backstage, after the performance, for after all, the critic was supposed to go backstage. The stage was crowded with well-wishers. It was bathed in clouds of perfume and a first lieutenant gazed with amazed admiration at Ica Nagy who went on talking in a high-pitched voice, lisping. Mr. Lengyel, a fat bank-clerk from Budapest, who had sewed Ica Nagy's costume, stood proudly at Ica's side and glanced at him tenderly. But as soon as Mr. Lengyel noticed him, he whispered something in Ica's ear who then flew over to him and curtsied:

"How did you like my performance, my dear editor?"

"It was charming, very charming."

There were tears of happiness in Ica's eyes and all of a sudden Ica threw himself on his chest, Ica Nagy's fragrant wig tickled his eyes, his stuffed breasts, his creamy white hands, soft as a girl's, were on his shoulder —

"I am so happy — " cried Ica Nagy, actress.

CHAPTER LIII

HE wrote the following article for the Siberian Gazette on the first performance of "Cyclamen" in Siberia:

"The local Captive Officers' Theater was the scene of a glamorous event on the evening of the tenth of this month.

"There are dressing-rooms made of blankets belonging to captive officers. I look in for a second, for fortunately the blankets have a hole in them and I can look in. Thank God, I do look in, I peep with my nose and with my ears and with my eyes, I am lost in the blanket, I can hardly stand on my feet, I stand trembling and excited by the illusions coming from the little hole.

"The smell of mascara and the smell of grease-paint, everything is colorful, an oil-lamp throws dim light upon many little trinkets — the remnants of costumes and illusion — equipment and things to madden the imagination — My God — It is the dressing-room in a small provincial theater — The senior officer of the local garrison, a captain, pays court to the prima donna, to the heroine, and next to them the ingénue glances over her part for the last time before going on the stage, and she looks in the mirror once more. The comédienne plays a cook, she is just trying on her white apron, and I gaze at them, holding my breath, I watch the captain as he stands there, a little too self-confident, before the heroine.

"The captain smiles, his left hand is on his hip, he wears his red cap, but his sword is not at his side, he must have left it in the anteroom — It seems to me, through the little hole, that the captain said something complimentary to the heroine. The compliment must have been very flattering because the heroine smiles now and curtsies. She smiles just as all provincial prima donnas are accustomed to smile and her curtsy is precisely such as is taught to little girls in dancing schools. She smiles and curtsies in such a manner that, were I an author, I should say: The heroine smiles promisingly at the captain.

"But no matter how promisingly the heroine smiles at the captain, the captain would not touch the heroine. Although there is an excellent opportunity to do so because the heroine now raises her mirror and tries out a sly little smile for the orchestra and a grateful nod to the galleries. My God — Where am I, in what little theater, what little town — I usually know about these things — Yes, yes — a fellow by the name of Novák is the director. The Novák Stock Company — He must be quite a new man, otherwise I would have remembered him at once.

"Look — What's that — The heroine picks up a little English pipe and she puts the pipe in the corner of her mouth and now the heroine lights the pipe and the heroine blows big clouds of smoke and I can smell the English tobacco which we bought from the Japanese through the American consul, Conger — We bought the tobacco on the installment plan and the pipe isn't paid for either and I see in the heroine's left cheek the little hole through which the bullet entered. It is like a dimple and the place where the bullet came out, on the heroine's neck, is covered with lace —

"The heroine was captured off Lutsk in a hand-to-hand fight, although I don't know why it is called a hand-to-hand fight when they shoot into one's cheek — Nor is the captain's saber left in the anteroom, it is lying somewhere in a military warehouse in Zhitomir and there is a number attached to it and the captain will get his saber back only after the war —

"And when the captain is about to leave the dressing-room, the heroine takes the pipe out of her mug — She holds the pipe now 'at trail arms' and she clicks together the heels of her low patent-leather shoes made out of boots, and she salutes, the heroine salutes the captain, she lifts her paw to her knot of hair and she salutes rigidly, because the heroine is only a cornet, although had she not been taken prisoner she would be a lieutenant now, and the captain wouldn't be a first lieutenant either, the captain would be a captain by now, if he hadn't been captured —

"The stage-manager rings the bell and the comédienne limps out; it isn't in her rôle to limp, yet the comédienne does limp, because her leg was shattered at Brest-Litovsk —

"And the heroine knocks the ashes out of her pipe and sighs and the Siberian Gazette and the Agitator will say, in their next issue: 'The local Captive Officers' Theater was the scene of a glamorous event on the evening of the tenth of this month.' "

Several officers disapproved of the article, they found it unworthy of the traditions of the Siberian Gazette. After all, camp-art strode forward with such steps that any mention of it should be made only in the most serious manner. Ervin Lang and Kunft were about to make an exhibition of their drawings. Lieutenant Nagy had begun to carve a box to keep gloves in and the work promised to be of high artistic quality. Machine-guns would be carved on the top of it and it was obvious that it would be beautiful. These were the days of plenty and Mæcenases sprang up. First Lieutenant Pick, for instance, the rich Pick, gave Héjjas, the artist, an order to paint his home, his children, and the portrait of his wife, in water colors, from a photo. And the performance would be repeated for those who had not seen it on the opening night and it would be repeated for the benefit of the two other camps, too; why shouldn't the men in the "Seven" and the fashionable audience from the "Baubezirk" see how far advanced culture in the "Six" was? Dantsek was feverishly at work on a cimbalom and on a roulette wheel. The command did all in its power to help every artistic effort. In the laundry, the orchestra practiced, the Bartakovics group placed their extra room at the disposal of the Choral Society for its rehearsals, the camp chaplain was preparing a new speech, and short stories piled up high in the editorial office of the Siberian Gazette. First Lieutenant Krebs ordered needlepoint samples from Khabarovsk and was diligently embroidering. The unexpected but brilliant dawn of the arts, music and literature had brought respect for the artists, the singers, the composers, the actors. A pleasant atmosphere of gentle attention and mild admiration surrounded them.

Indeed, no one disapproved of the fact that the artists received larger rations of the various gifts sent to them by charity organizations than the rest of them, and that they got them free of charge, and everybody smiled when the rumor began to spread that Ica Nagy painted himself pale and then went and asked the doctor for preserves. Of course, the doctor smiled, and he pinched Ica Nagy's cheeks, and he gave him preserves, and a box of pulverized eggs.

The Regulars also worked in the theater, they even played small rôles. For the first time in the history of the camp, they worked together with the Reservists. Of course it seemed as if the leading actors had been of higher rank than what they displayed on their collars. Especially the actresses. After all they should be treated differently. After all it was the actresses who brought something new, something spicy to the play, who awakened old memories.

During the morning walk, one could often hear an occasional sharp "I kiss your hand, my dear lady," and at first only humorously, but in a few days half seriously, the answer came in a lisping, high-pitched voice, "Hello, darling — "

It happened that high officers came over from the "Baubezirk," they wanted to make the acquaintance of one or the other of the actresses. At such times, the adjutant appeared in the room and politely said:

"His Excellency, General Komma, would like to see Miss Ica Nagy — "

Then Ica Nagy, or Leona Lakner, would fix up his hair before the mirror and would spray a few drops of Eau de Cologne on his tunic. One day, Leona Lakner was observed to look dreamily and for quite a while at a piece of rouge hesitating whether to use it —

After the performance given for the benefit of the "Baubezirk," the respect paid to the camp-actresses grew even more, especially after General Komma had written in the pretty Ica Nagy's album: "Du bist wie eine Blume, so hold und schön und rein — "

It was no wonder therefore that one morning Ica Nagy dashed in in a highly nervous state and threw himself crying on his Chinese blanket. He complained of migraine and he was trembling all over. He was quite beside himself. His proud box-mates stood around shocked and they learned only after several minutes what had been the cause of the tears.

As a matter of fact, it had been quite a while since anybody had last said to an actress, "Hello, there." This was permitted only to colleagues or, at the most, to the newspapermen. Everybody saluted the actresses in advance and it was quite natural that even if he did not say, "I kiss your hand," or what was even more customary, "Permit me to cover your dear little hands with kisses," he at least smiled when he saluted. It was simply incredible, therefore, and no one could understand what got into Lieutenant Székely. He actually stopped Ica Nagy in the yard and called him down because he had not saluted him. Ica Nagy declared that he would never again set foot in the theater. They shouldn't count on him for the next performance.

In a few seconds the Major himself appeared and tried to console Ica Nagy and soon Lieutenant Székely appeared also. He was of course commanded to do so, nevertheless he begged the injured actress's pardon and it was quite nice of Lieutenant Székely, really quite nice of him, that he lifted Ica Nagy's soft hands to his lips and smiling, amidst the deafening applause of the roommates, courteously kissed them.

Lieutenant Székely's beautiful and noble act assuaged the actress. His face radiated joy and he was happily receiving congratulations all day for having broken through in the name of Art the grim walls of Military Discipline.

That evening, a group of admirers gathered in Ica's box, but at midnight Ica, with a charming smile upon his lips, sent them away.

"Turn out the light, children, I want to go to bed — I want to undress in the dark — " he said bashfully.

CHAPTER LIV

SEVERAL of them had been afraid that the success of the theater would drive the other cultural activities into the background. It was not so, for the theater only animated the artists and the writers. As a matter of fact, the theater remained the leading institution but the other activities were also successful and great interest was manifested in sports, too. The command dropped the idea of setting-up exercises, nevertheless some of them banded together and founded a physical training class and they planned to have sports meetings in the summer. The Regulars and those who hoped for quick promotion on account of their behavior on the front listened to lectures delivered by old soldiers. The activities on the various fronts were now discussed at these lectures so that those who were not interested in them did not have to attend. Attendance was not compulsory, although it would not hurt anybody to attend because the war was still going on and one could never tell whether, in case of a separate peace with Russia, these experiences would not come in handy. But everybody was responsible to himself alone, and the command did not want to force anybody.

The theater remained the most important of all activities, neither the military lectures nor the vaudeville performance in the "Seven," neither the Lang-Kunft Art School nor the shorthand course, neither the embroidery instruction nor the lectures in New Criminal Procedure could possibly compete with it.

The actors did not live separate lives, after all, they lived in the boxes with them, among the other prisoners, all the actresses, actors, musicians, singers, technical staff, dressmakers, scenic designers, the curtain raiser, the prompter, the stage manager. Nevertheless you could see at once who belonged to the theater, because there was a little difference. They walked about more self-confidently, they were more intimate with the things that were of great interest to all of them, and they themselves regarded their own activities with a little mystery. They were not very talkative and they whispered only among themselves. Until now, the command had overlooked a very quaint custom. Certain gentlemen bribed the Chinese sanitary laborers who were hired to remove the refuse from the camp in big barrels. The Chinese brought in the barrels empty but, for good money, they occasionally smuggled in a couple of desperate Chinese maidens in the empty barrels. It was an epicurean matter to be permitted to receive the favors of such a Chinese maiden, it was a matter of taste and of money, too, because the business was quite expensive. The girls had to be carried out of the camp too, and the Chinese did this only if the extravagant gentlemen paid extra.

After the advent of the white Ica Nagy, and of Leona Lakner, who always played passionate rôles, the men developed a nausea for these miserable Chinese girls and the traffic in girls became practically extinct. Leona Lakner brought up the question first, he said the custom was unworthy of the officers and they readily realized that the custom was indeed a disgrace to the weaker sex. The command confidentially informed the officers that, hereafter, the smuggling in of women would be strictly prohibited and when this confidential order was read, the actresses looked at each other, and said, quite relieved:

"Thank God."

They even smiled and Ica put his hand on the head of a blond aspirant and absent-mindedly began to play with the blond aspirant's curly locks. It was one of those distrait moments in the life of a great actress when she decided to scatter small favors.

Until now, the camp had not been accustomed to gossip. Some of them had occasionally mentioned certain things, but there had never been any genuine material for gossip. How it had begun, no one knew, but all of a sudden it was there. Girls' names were getting popular and some of them, especially the younger and better-looking lads, were suddenly called Katy or Cinci by everybody. They poked each other in the ribs, winked slyly at each other, and whispered:

"Gizi — "

"Oh, you don't say so!"

"But I do — "

"Don't be crazy — "

"Yes, he has been called Gizi for a week now. I tell you that little Austrian chicken is the prettiest of the whole bunch — "

To be sure, Gizi was indeed a piquant thing. He lived in a large box with Ervin Lang and Kunft. He was a curly-haired Austrian aspirant. They had said in the camp that the artists had taught the little aspirant how to paint. Now they said: The artists say that they are teaching Gizi how to paint, but —

Indeed, several portraits of Gizi were exhibited and in every one of them he was made up as a girl. One of them pictured him with a large Spanish shawl, the other one represented him as a gypsy-girl, with a comb in his hair.

The implications did not cease but none of them found anything extraordinary in them. Nothing humiliating or insulting. Those to whom they were told and those of whom they were told merely laughed, or playfully slapped the tellers on the mouth, and when an actress was told of such a thing he said, "Naughty, naughty," and slyly threatened the accuser with his finger.

One morning, when the Russian colonel came to inspect them, as was his custom, just when they were washing, the colonel stopped in the middle of the room, which was quite an unusual thing for him to do, and stayed there lost in thought for several minutes. This was an extraordinary occurrence and they realized only at night what it meant. For when the orders of the day were read in the evening they were informed that hereafter the beds could not be placed next to each other but had to be separated by screens.

It was to be expected. Of course, the theater could not be blamed for everything, although it is, everywhere, at home, too, the great parade ground of eroticism. Here, the theater acted like a spark which, falling into the gunpowder of sexuality accumulating for four years, exploded the erotic sentiments from one day to another. And all these children, who had just reached sexual maturity but were still subconscious of it, and quite inexperienced, were suddenly swept into this kind of gratification, instead of the usual trangressions of youth. Female wigs and false breasts and rustling skirts and Conger's perfumes fell into this cave of natural human desires and sentiments suppressed ascetically for long years like sparks into a barrel of dynamite. The staves of morals exploded and the splinters were now flying in a thousand directions —

They spoke quite openly about the case of Captain Branning, which was indeed very comical. Captain Branning had an orderly who was a good drummer and therefore was made the drummer of the officers' orchestra. It was an open secret in the "Baubezirk" that Captain Branning of the Imperial German Army was very attached to his orderly and when Branning's roommate died, he would have liked to have him as his roommate. The command, however, detailed an officer to the room. Branning ran around in despair. He begged, requested and petitioned so zealously that the command found the matter very queer and it was said that Colonel Mitteräger himself would take up the matter. But Branning went over his head to Waletzky and the Polish captain one day appeared in the "Baubezirk" and said in an extremely sarcastic and ironic tone:

"You always say, gentlemen, that I never fulfill any of your requests. You charge me with various things. I appreciate an old soldier's request, however. I hereby order that no one shall be placed in Captain Branning's room because he has the right to live with his orderly if he wants to — "

This was about the only request Captain Waletzky had granted in all these years without fights. Branning was walking about radiating happiness, he came over for every performance, and watched with tender attention how his protégé beat the drum in the orchestra, his protégé who was a pink-faced Tyrolese boy and who showed quite clearly that he was very spoiled. During intermissions, Captain Branning dashed out for pastry, and he gave them personally to the drummer who thanked him for these expressions of attention with a blush on his face.

Lengyel, the Budapest bank-clerk, became an expert in dressmaking. He went to town occasionally to study the latest fashion and, in a few weeks, everybody called him Madame Josephine. They called him Josephine because his real name was Joseph.

Madame Josephine walked around winking and blinking and he had a good word for everybody, and was very much interested in his art. He was always contemplating new creations and he was full of petty gossip. When he tried a new gown on one of the actresses, he stopped before him, bent his head to one side and looked at it enraptured, then took the pins out of his mouth and said, slyly winking:

"Cute, isn't it?"

He would have liked the whole camp to be interested in nothing but the actresses wearing his gowns, in nothing but what Madame Josephine had made out of that clumsy Rebecca Ellenbogen.

He carried messages to the actresses, and little gifts. He said that he would have flowers in stock, as soon as spring came. The actresses were very pleased when they were sent flowers. Of course, in winter time, flowers were pretty expensive in Siberia but it was he who proposed that one could not possibly appear in cheap stockings and cheap underwear in "The Count of Luxembourg." Illusion was very important. Finally his suggestion was carried out and he was empowered to buy, for the actresses, silk combinations, silk stockings and one pair of silk garters for each one of them. He wanted fine perfumes, too, and new false breasts, but both of his propositions were discarded by the Drama Committee, partly because the old breasts were quite serviceable and partly because there was plenty of Eau de Cologne left over from the last Conger-shipment and there was no sense in spending money for them.

The Drama Committee had another reason for discarding Madame Josephine's proposition. The Committee was well aware of the fact that there were several spendthrift Mæcenases who used to send perfume and things like that to the actresses. Consequently they saw absolutely no sense in spending anything out of their own for these things.

They voted against the powder, too, there was enough of it still, American powder, from the Conger-shipment. There was no rouge, however, and an order was placed to bring some, together with other grease-paint. Madame Josephine was radiantly happy when he arrived with all these beautiful things from town and he was screeching from the wagon already: "I have brought everything, my dears, I have everything."

The long, gaunt, freckled cornet, and the anæmic aspirant, and the aspirant in heavy boots, clapped their hands in glee and chirped endearing words to the fat Madame Josephine who, after finishing his work, buried his tired head in his hands and suddenly remembered:

"My God — My God — What are the children doing now at 32 József Boulevard, third floor — And my wife — Poor Paula — Do they have anything to eat? My God — This war —"

CHAPTER LV

THE pride of the Germans was Kinderlyn. He was taller even than Leona Lakner, and he carried a very small head on a huge body. He was a real actor; he was said to be a member of the Dresden National Theater. The Germans also organized a company but for one performance only. They planned to present a drama — of course with Kinderlyn in the leading rôle — and two or three small bits by Schnitzler. This performance also took place, and the Germans raved with bated breath during the first play in which Kinderlyn acted the part of a half-naked, leopard-skinned, helmeted individual who was bellowing inarticulately throughout the play. The rest of the actors were merely supers around him. The play was a German classic, but only Kinderlyn got a rôle in it. He recited throughout the play and the Germans enjoyed it immensely. Goldegg played in "Literature," one of the Schnitzler playlets; it had been expected that he would. He portrayed the authoress who married the aristocrat at the end. He was very good, he brought out the varied sentiments of the play very well, he was passionate with the count and a foolish little Bohemian girl with the author. Old captains were beside themselves with enthusiasm, the Germans yelled proudly and triumphantly. The Hungarians did not like it very much, some of them remarked: Our plays are different, there is life in our plays and temperament. But there were others who said that, on the other hand, there was literature in Germany, and taste and culture.

But from then on, the cultures of the nations united and they helped each other mutually. They even decided that they would present a bilingual vaudeville performance on New Year's Eve. That is to say, the performance would be given in the two leading languages, in Hungarian and in German, because every one understood at least one of these two, even the Imperial Ottoman officers spoke a little German.

The command, of course, made the best of the protheatrical sentiment. It gave all the help possible to the theater because it sensed, and very correctly, too, that this form of amusement, and its various side branches, drained off many things. Until now, the mob had had only bread, now they had circuses, too, and they looked at events through a pleasant mist. One could not touch the theater, it was the apple of their eye, and as far as the other camps were concerned, an object of envy.

One day the camp began to receive relief packages, and from that day cases were arriving every day. Chinese quilts and Chinese boots arrived and, before they were distributed, the theater was asked what it needed. It asked for everything: the boots it needed for the theatrical employees, who often worked in the yard in bitter-cold weather in the interests of the community, and the quilts partly because of their cotton stuffings, which were used up in the property furniture, and partly because of the cloth-coverings, which served as canvas on the settings. The command governed the camp through the theater, and since so many things were constantly arriving, the command was no longer a negligible factor. It was strengthened by various hangers-on. The major was no longer independent; now that there were things to be distributed, more and more officers asked for a share in the government. The major was not exactly forced to surrender his power, but he had his weak point and this was completely taken advantage of by those who demanded to be admitted to the government. The major, as a matter of plain fact, was not a major, only a captain, and the climbers used this bit of information to exert pressure on him. As long as there had been no reason for doing so, nobody had cared to bring up this matter, but now one could often hear a senior officer remark, as if it had been merely a slip of the tongue: "The captain, oh, I am sorry, I should have said, the major — "

The captain-major did not object. Willingly or not, he had to acquiesce in the fact that a sort of council attached itself to him. And within a very short time, this council was in command of everything. These men were not as tolerant as the major had been. As soon as the camp acquired a Cabinet, discipline became more severe. As soon as a Treasury came into existence, the social classes were definitely segregated. There were some who suddenly turned up their noses and no one knew why. Exclusive societies were organized on the most fantastic grounds. Thus, for instance, a fox-hunters' society came into being. Only captains, Kammerherren, and gentile cavalry officers were admitted to it. They met every Friday evening for a few glasses of wine and they planned a banquet for next year's St. Hubertus' Day.

To be sure, they did not discriminate against artists and newspaper men, and especially not against actresses. They often invited the artists as their guests. But religious controversies arose and these disturbed even the peace of the arts. The first clash occurred at a vaudeville performance shortly before New Year's Eve, on account of Monis Neumann. He played because he was the one who best remembered the humorous little skit they wanted to present and he would not let them have the script unless he was permitted to play in it. Monis portrayed a Hungarian soldier. The other character, a German soldier, was played by him. The two of them got together in a café, one of them did not speak Hungarian, the other one knew nothing but German, but they became quite good friends. In the course of the play Monis Neumann ejaculated:

"God damn it—"

Whereupon Lieutenant Czernin, brother, or nephew, of our Bucharest ambassador, leapt to his feet and yelled out:

"Schweinerei—"

And he walked out of the room. The performance continued in a depressed spirit. Lieutenant Czernin was a very influential man at home, some of them said that, after the return, he would report, about the camp, directly to the Court and that he would be in a position to drop a few words in favor of some of his comrades and also a few words of damnation against others.

Lieutenant Czernin immediately submitted a written report to the command in which he complained that the Christian religion had been insulted at the performance, he had heard distinctly that Lieutenant Monis Neumann had cursed the Holy Mary. The height of infamy! Several of them suddenly began to remember that Monis had really said the incriminated phrase. Some of them even went so far as to declare most definitely that they themselves had not left the auditorium merely because they had not wanted to create a scandal. Monis defended himself, he said he had submitted the rôle to the censor and he had not intended to insult anybody. The Hungarian soldier, alas, used the phrase in question quite often, nevertheless, he had not said it. At this point, the situation was this: the Jews did not remember anything, not even the phrase Monis admitted, and the anti-Semites remembered everything, including the phrase Czernin submitted in his report.

Storm was brewing in the camp. The prospects were that either the order of the camp would be completely overturned or the Jews would have to be moved to a separate camp. Practically all of them cursed the Jews, but if, by accident, there was a Jew among them, they invariably added: "Of course we don't mean you, you are an exception." There was one exception in practically every box. The actors tried to bring about peace, but their efforts were unsuccessful.

Disorder reigned in the camp now, and bitterness against the Jews, especially when some one brought the news that Monis Neumann complained to the Russians about the persecution of the Jews, and that even that lousy Waletzky, the greatest anti-Semite on the Eastern Hemisphere between Warsaw and Vladivostok, greatly disapproved of the friction. He said it was unheard of and he would have to intervene himself.

The news arrived at two in the afternoon, and within an hour they were already forced to call together an officers' meeting. The excitement had reached its climax. Neumann was asked whether he had really complained to the Polish captain, and whether he knew what the consequences of such a dastardly move were. By this time, the roommates in the various boxes were no longer on speaking terms.

At the meeting it was disclosed that Waletzky had learned of the incident quite by accident. It was Monis's great luck that First Lieutenant Körös, one of the "reliable" men, had been present when Waletzky had asked Neumann. He testified that Waletzky had already known of the affair, that he had merely asked Monis whether there had been any affairs, and that Monis had answered: "I have had no affair with anybody, not a word of it is true, the Captain has been misinformed."

But this did not put the excitement to sleep. The anti-Semites merely remarked: "They have escaped this time — "

A similar incident occurred in the "Baubezirk." Some of the senior officers in that camp organized a society: the Society of Those Who Will Not Return the Salute of a Jew. First Lieutenant Almoslino, the postmaster, did not know who the members of this society were and, one day, he quite accidentally saluted one of them. The club-member, of course, did not return the greeting.

Almoslino was a rich Spanish Jew who had moved to Budapest from Bosnia. He did not create an affair of honor out of this incident, he merely went to the commander of the "Baubezirk" and demanded an officers' meeting. The commander did not deem it necessary to call together the meeting, for, after all, it was a private affair, but since the excitement had reached quite a high point, the officers' meeting was called together. First Lieutenant Almoslino rose and, taking a small cross out of his wallet, said:

"As a reward for my work done in behalf of Catholic churches destroyed by Mohammedans in Bosnia-Herzegovina, His Holiness, the Pope, gave me the cross of Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice. Here it is. For these very same activities, the Hungarian Cardinal-Primate sent me his paternal blessings and I treasure the postal-card on which he sent them after me to prison in gratitude and reverence — "

First Lieutenant Almoslino then pinned the cross on his chest and handed over the card to the commander of the camp.

The case of First Lieutenant Almoslino put an end to the persecution of Jews once and for all.

CHAPTER LVI

BUT there were also definite achievements to which the command and its councilors could point with pride. First of all, the material prosperity of the camp was beyond dispute. The Red Cross visits and the consuls and the various things sold on the installment plan created luxury. Science and the arts were generously succored and, at last, peace reigned among the various sects. It spoke highly of the commander's wisdom and tact that he placed a Jewish cornet on the Christmas Eve program. Indeed, the Jewish cornet's Christmas tale was the high point of the festivities. The first number on the program was a sermon delivered by the camp chaplain, then Captain Benkö said the Lord's Prayer, and this was followed by the Christmas tale. It was said that the cornet warned the commander that the anti-Semitic feelings had not yet completely disappeared, and that, although he was not afraid, it would be perhaps wise not to place a Jew on the Christmas Eve program, especially not after the chaplain and the Lord's Prayer, because it might hurt certain persons.

"Army Regulations never discriminate against any religion. What matters is that I have confidence in your talents. It is, however, important that the tale should be solemn and touching — "

So the Jewish cornet stepped on the platform, and at the foot of the glistening Christmas tree, at the foot of the green tree of peace surrounded by symbolical barbed-wire fences, he began his tale:

"This is the tale of a little Hungarian cow.

"The tale of an ordinary country cow which grazed peacefully on the fields until the very end of its life.

"Until the day the fate of all aged cows overtook it.

"For when it grew old, and weak, it became sick — perhaps because of an indiscretion in its youth — and then the charming, good, old cow was no longer of any service. There was nothing to do now but to slaughter it, and they slaughtered it and skinned it, my friends. Its flesh — the war had broken out in the meantime — was taken to the packer's.

"Its flesh was cut to small pieces and put into a big iron kettle, Makó onion was added to it, and Szeged paprika and Mármaros salt and it was cooked, and then it was put in small tin cans, and the tin cans were sent to replacement troops, the tin cans containing our little cow.

"The cow was now in haversacks, and it traveled into all the four directions of the compass, it went to war with beflowered soldiers. The cow's heart went to the Italian front, its liver went south, and a piece of its leg found its way to the Russian front.

"The tale will now concern itself exclusively with that part of the cow which went to the Russian front.

"The tin was now in the haversack of an old aspirant and the good tin waited patiently until it would be consumed. But it was a tin to be reserved for emergency purposes only; therefore it was not permitted to be eaten, unless specially commanded. The special command, however, did not arrive. There came many commands but never this one.

"The tin began to think now that they had forgotten all about it. But it was mistaken. Once the battalion orders of the day asked whether it was still there.

"Of course it was there, although it was quite tired of trench warfare, but, alas, the weather was not advantageous for an advance. The weather was fine for patrolling, however, and it went patrolling every day. Every day it went for a walk with the aspirant toward the Russian trenches.

"There were times when the aspirant had to crawl, at other times he had to run, sometimes he jumped and sometimes he was creeping forward on his belly. The poet tin was very much afraid. It was so afraid that it often hung on to something. Once the aspirant remarked:

" 'Why, this tin in my haversack is quite heavy — '

"But once the lying down was of no avail. Lying down was of avail only against bullets, anyway, it did not protect one against bayonets.

"It did not protect him now either, but the aspirant was not killed because the bayonet did not touch any of the important organs. It went through his tongue only and pierced his right cheek, but that was all.

"Then the enemy soldier pulled the bayonet out of the aspirant, because he needed the rifle. The enemy made a stretcher out of this rifle, with the help of another one, because he was taught to do so on the drill-ground. With another Russian, the aspirant was taken to Russia on this stretcher.

"The enemy put the haversack under the aspirant's head in order that he should lie more comfortably. If they had not done this, the aspirant could not have breathed, he had lost a lot of blood, and it would have been very unpleasant for him if he had not been able to breathe.

"The aspirant was slowly cured in the Russian hospital. His recovery was slow, but not on account of the tongue. It was delayed on account of his belly, because later they discovered that that too had been shot through.

"At last he was completely cured. He lost some weight, to be sure, but they sent him off to a camp of prisoners of war just the same.

"These prisoners lived in infinite Siberia, far away, on the shores of the Yellow Sea. They lived there in sorrow, but they managed to make room for the aspirant.

"And he began, too, just like the others, he began, too: to wait for peace.

"He built a tent, too, just like the other prisoners, he built a box out of colored cardboard and planks. He procured for himself a table and some small chairs. He put his treasures in order: he hung the Japanese and Lake Baikal picture cards on the cardboard walls, put his summer and winter underwear in a cigar box, in short, he tidied up the house.

"And he gazed at his rescued belongings, which he had been carrying ever since he had left home: three camp postal cards, two little notebooks and the tin can with the cow's flesh. The tin can he had not yet opened because it had not been commanded.

"The command had not arrived.

" 'And now — it will never arrive,' the orphaned aspirant reflected.

"The old aspirant only gazed and gazed at the tin can and one day Christmas came.

"Christmas came again, the Siberian Christmas came again, although all the cabbalas, and all the magic formulas, and even the great Napoleon's own solitaire said that there would be no more Siberian Christmas.

"Nevertheless, the Siberian Christmas was here again.

"The Siberian Christmas Eve was here again and one could not see the prisoners in the low-walled boxes because they all buried their heads in their hands.

"Their sighs came sadly; the invisible telegraph machines of times and distances, and the tearful wagon of memories raced with them to far-away snow-covered yards, to far-away Christmas trees —

"There was a huge Christmas tree in the heart of every prisoner, a great, big, brilliant, crying, glistening Christmas tree.

"There were little lamps with paper shades on the little tables in the boxes, and great silence, solemn, churchly silence hung in the rooms. The prisoners prayed and their hands trembled and their hearts fluttered. And the aspirant's hands trembled too and his heart was also full of reverence and he took his knife out of his pocket, and he took the battered, worn, battle-scarred tin can off the shelf. He stuck his knife in the can, and now all the prisoners, hearing the noise, turned and looked at him. He opened the tin can and rose in the dimly lighted room, the bearded aspirant rose, and it seemed as if he had been a priest, and his voice sounded as if it had come from a pulpit.

"He raised high the battered, worn, battle-scarred tin can and, in a colorless, ghastly voice, he spoke:

" 'There are peace-meat and peace-blood, peace-skies and peace-earth — there are peace-grass and peace-meadows, peace-water and peace-air in it — and peace-flowers and peace-sun-rays — '

"And all the miserable and unfortunate prisoners gathered around him and they ate out of the tin can, of the cow's flesh.

"They ate of it and cried.

"It was like a ceremony addressed to the hearts, like an inspiring prophecy, like a magic message, like a cheerful and peaceful holiday.

"It was like all these, and peace and patient hopes settled in their hearts for the night. . . ."

The tale had a great effect on the prisoners, some of them even cried, they were so touched. The editor of the Siberian Gazette asked the cornet for the tale, he said he wanted to publish it in his paper. Then everybody might copy it out of the paper and keep it as a souvenir.

The prisoners stayed together until very late on Christmas Eve and, silently lost in thoughts, they sipped tea in the study. Many went up to the Jewish cornet to congratulate him, even the extremists were pacified and they all shook hands with him. They said, this was different, this was something. One wouldn't have thought that there were people who so thoroughly felt the spirit of the holiday of Brotherly Love.

Lieutenant Gotthilf also went up to the cornet and sat down next to him. He was silent for a while, then said:

"Why doesn't a man like you show himself in a museum?"

"What's that? What did you say, please?"

The poor cornet stuttered in his amazement.

"What did you say, please?"

"I said, why don't you show yourself in a museum? No, not in a museum! I should have said, in a freak show!"

"What do you want of me? Why should I show myself in a museum?"

"Because you ought to be stuffed. Because you are the greatest conformer on earth. Because you're a model for assimilation and adaptation. Why can't you write such brilliant tales for your own holidays — "

"Of course, I can — I can — "

Dr. Gotthilf smiled sarcastically: "Don't wait another minute. Go over to their side right away."

German officers came to his table and stared at him in admiration. They had already been told of the story and they looked at the cornet as if he had been a magician. "Braver Kerl — Braver Kerl," they said.

A captain was enthusiastically explaining to a Tyrolese yager lieutenant that there had not been so clever a tactical move in the entire war. The command has done this beautifully. All the aspirants and cornets in the camp had now been placed under an obligation. For hadn't it been a cornet who had shone so brilliantly? And the anti-Semites were also disarmed, and the Jews, too. To put this Jewish cornet on the program was a superb move on the part of the command. To be sure, he was a talented chap, one had to admit that the whole thing wouldn't have been worth a damn without him. But just the same, it had been a clever move on the part of the command.

"Well, tell me," Dr. Gotthilf's sharp voice yelled at one of the tables, "tell me, what if Almoslino has no Papal cross? Then do they have to kill all the Jews? Suppose this cornet is untalented. Does that necessarily mean that you have to stage a pogrom? Because, don't forget, there almost was a pogrom here — "

First Lieutenant Haertl approached the cornet with a sly grin on his lips. He blinked from behind his glistening pince-nez at the story-teller and discreetly gave him a piece of paper under the table. The story-teller put the folded paper on the table. What did Haertl want of him in secret?

It was an order for a black overcoat, free of charge, from the warehouse of the Welfare Committee.

The poor story-teller went pale and ambled out of the room with trembling knees.

As he was approaching the door he heard two half-baked aspirants arguing in the anteroom:

"You didn't understand the whole story. I tell you, it was a revolutionary story. The Jews are always thinking of the revolution. He wanted to say that the seed of the revolution is there in every man's haversack. But they don't open it, not until the Great Holiday. Then the one who has most faithfully preserved it, will open it and then everybody will eat of the cow's flesh, people from all over the world will go in pilgrimage to him and everybody will feast on the tin can of the haversack — "

"Perhaps he didn't mean any symbols? Perhaps he merely wanted to tell us a tale, a Christmas tale — "

"Ah, don't be crazy — "

CHAPTER LVII

BELLS ring all over the world, bells ring in churches, and bells ring beneath the Christmas trees, bells ring in schools and parliaments and bells ring for horses on race-tracks — But here, in our camp, bells ring only in the guard room, when Waletzky comes, and they open the gates for him alone. But they ring no bells for us — the gates are never thrown open for us —

"There is no silk here, only one cheap Japanese silk handkerchief protrudes from the pocket of the praporshchik, but, at home, beautiful silk cravats are on display in the show-windows, silk shirts sweat on the backs of jockeys, silks cover the pink breasts of deserted brides, silk is on the girls' heads, on blonde, brunette, and Titian heads, silent and happy and loud and exciting silks —

"Our taste has been destroyed and we eat nothing but fish — we live without books, and papers, without streets, without freedom, without occupations —

"We do not go visiting, we never go to see our parents, we can't see our children, we don't fight for civic rights, for social reforms —

"We begged the Countess to get marmalade for us, we begged her for two dessert days weekly —

"And now the Countess thinks that this is the only desire in our hearts, this: the two dessert days —

"We are wrapped in Chinese quilts and we walk in a snow-covered courtyard and we live on foreign words and we constantly get farther and farther away from our own lives —

"But we have to tell you, Countess, that the marmalade and the two dessert days float only on the surface of our hearts.

"If you opened our hearts with a key you would see that we keep these cheap and tawdry things only on the surface —

"If you opened our hearts, Countess, if you unloaded them, you would see that, at the bottom of our hearts, we keep secrets: hopes are kept there, frozen hopes, desperate and mad hopes, of which we dare not even think —

"Our hearts would scream and bleed in your hands, Countess, because the voice of our children, the pain of our wives, the smile of our little girls, the trembling hopes of our mothers, the fear of our fathers, the voice of village church bells, the weight of our sad days are buried there, and our frozen and desperate hopes, too, which know neither day nor night, neither rest nor holiday —

"That's why we need the French language and the Tatar language and 'The Life of the Bees,' and 'The Life of Lady Hamilton,' and the Captive Officers' Theater and the two dessert days and the cheap marmalade —

"In the village of Kitai beggars, up on the hill, in red brick barracks, in the camp of prisoners of war — "

This editorial was published in the Siberian Gazette anent the fact that, within a very short time, the second attempt at escape had occurred.

The superficial observer must have thought that the camp was completely lost in mortal pleasure, that there was nothing in the camp but artistic and cultural activities, and affairs of honor, and petty fights in the theater, and arguments, and intrigue.

Scandals in the dressing-rooms: Who would play the two-word rôle of a chambermaid at the next performance? Who would be the next one to be lifted out of the chorus? And who would receive, along with the rôle, silk combinations and silk garters instead of cheap underwear and rubber garters? Was there again going to be a fight about this, just as on the other day, when the performance had very nearly been canceled on account of the actresses quarreling?

And then was there nothing but these questions of seniority, was there nothing to do but speculate whether Captain Benkö was first lieutenant only and Major Steiner merely a captain? And then all those arguments with First Lieutenant Haertl! He trembled for every piece of soap he gave out, as if he had been giving away his own. Did those who sent the relief packages expect to get paid for them? Were the Americans really trying to make a business out of the plight of the prisoners? And was Schenk never going to stop his twanging at the guitar? The gymnasts were already training for the gymnastic meetings in the spring, and there were some who had just begun to read six-volume novels. It seemed as if a wicked bane had been sitting on the camp, as if they had all forgotten their connections with the outer world.

Only when Postmaster Almoslino arrived and placed a big pile of cards from home on the table of the study, there reigned a frightened and shocked silence in the camp.

Green and yellow cards dropped on the table, green for the Hungarians, yellow for the Austrians, and they ran to the table when their names were read as if it had been the roll-call of Judgment Day.

It seemed that the cheap marmalade and the admiration for the arts and the intoxication of the guitar floated only on the surface —

But within a very short time, two attempts at escape had taken place.

Aladár Dajka Dantsek, the wizardly jack-of-all-trades of the camp, had always succeeded in everything he had attempted.

He had succeeded in making a bass viol, a still, a violin out of six or seven hundred pieces, he had succeeded in solving the problem of the theater's spotlight — it had finally been made out of oil lamps — he had succeeded in making a trap-door for the theater, and a curtain too.

For some weeks past, he had been seen in grave conversation with his four box-mates and whenever any one approached, they became very silent. Everybody thought that they were preparing a great joke, a colossal surprise. Perhaps they were building a revolving stage, nothing was impossible to Dantsek.

One day, Captain Waletzky and the Russian colonel came to inspect the camp. The colonel, God alone knew why, was on horseback and he was madly racing around the camp. Waletzky, with a brief-case under his arm, ran asthmatically after him, to be on hand whenever the colonel stopped. In one spot, the snow sunk in under the colonel and he was nearly lost, together with his horse, in the snow.

The colonel told Waletzky, who arrived out of breath, to go and see what there was on the other side of the fence, behind that building. It was forty-five below zero, said the colonel, and the snow should have been frozen sufficiently to carry a man with his horse without any danger to them.

Waletzky returned after a little while and assured the colonel with a bland smile on his lips that it was nothing, there was only some kind of ditch there, a pit of no importance. The colonel went away, but Waletzky returned.

He called together the officers and in a very nervous and excited tone told them that he had expected the prisoners to be more clever. The camp should realize that any kind of attempt at escape was foolish. Some of them had dug a pit beneath the snow near the fence and, under the protection of the snow, had taken several planks out of the fence. If the colonel had not come this morning, the miserable wretches might have attempted escape to-night. He would not waste a word on the whole affair, and they knew it, if it were merely a question of putting the runaways before a firing squad. But if their attempted escape had come to light, he would have also lost his job. Consequently he would not report it this time and would act as if he had not learned of it at all. On the other hand, he knew that the attempt could not have been made by any one but Dantsek, the jack-of-all-trades. And he would immediately proceed to search his quarters. Realize, gentlemen, and this I am telling you as one intelligent man to another, it is forty-five below at night. The miserable wretch could not drag himself farther than five kilometers at the most. There are guards on the Amur and guards on the Ussuri. Suppose he steals through them. Suppose he reaches China. Don't you know that a strip twenty kilometers wide beyond the border line is under the supervision of the Russians? Cossacks patrol that strip. Do you know what fate is awaiting the runaways in China? The Chinese are ready to murder them for a pair of boots. The stupidest thing on earth is to risk one's life in vain. This time I shan't report it, but I may as well tell you frankly that I do so merely because I want to keep my job. I hope that you will realize this. Let me remind you once more, there is no sense in fighting one's way through ten thousand versts when death, certain death, lurks around the corner at every verst.

Then he confiscated from Dantsek the collapsible and portable rowboat, the wooden skates, the primitive dagger and the half-bag of dried rye bread which was supposed to have sustained him to the very end of the Gobi Desert, throughout his way to Indo-China, or, perhaps, to Persia —

Ernst Wurm was the Hungarians' favorite German. In the Hungarian plays, he played only in the chorus, but he often got rôles in German plays. His last part was that of a young girl who, amazed at everything, repeated throughout the evening:

"Wenn das die Mama wüsste —"

The locks of a blonde wig glistened over Ernst Wurm's boyish face as he kept on repeating, both on the opening night and on the revival, innocently, charmingly and purely, this simple sentence:

"Wenn das die Mama wüsste — If Mamma only knew of this — "

But Mamma Wurm did not know of anything. She did not know that little Ernst was a conscientious and diligent student who undertook to portray feminine rôles at the urgent requests of his box-mates only, that he had remained a good and pure-hearted boy, that he was even more amazed at life, at the queer life prisoners led, than at the things that happened on the stage.

But, one day, Ernst Wurm vanished from the camp. And no one knew how. All of a sudden he was nowhere.

Russian lumber-jacks told them a few days later that they had met an aspirant in the forest on the Ussuri. He had begged them not to mention their meeting him to any one, and he had given them money for showing him the shortest way to China.

A patrol composed of prisoners went to look for him and they found Aspirant Ernst Wurm frozen to death at the foot of a tree on the bank of the Ussuri. The small sleigh he had taken with him was now standing by his side, but it did not contain one bite of the food which was to have sustained Ernst Wurm on his way to Indo-China or Persia.

The puttee was missing from one of his legs. Whoever robbed Ernst of his food had first strangled him to death with the puttee. Ernst Wurm froze only after he had been murdered and robbed.

A sad funeral took place in the camp the next day.

The senior officer of Room Number Six began his address over the coffin thus:

"Wenn das die Mama wüsste — If Mamma only knew of this — "

It seemed that the two dessert days floated on the surface of the hearts only. It seemed that at the bottom of their hearts there was agonizing despair. For, after all, it is only human to have superficial and mortal laughter on the lips at a time when corpses lie unburied in the hearts....

CHAPTER LVIII

THE evening brought a great surprise. Simi Grosz looked around proudly before he began to read, he smiled self-confidently, as if he himself had done it all.

"Petrograd is in the midst of a great rebellion. The garrison has rebelled and joined the Revolution —

(He remembered Professor Regéczi who had often explained to them that rebels should never be confused with revolutionaries, and especially not with those who rise against the yoke of a foreign power to gain freedom for their country. Simi Grosz mentioned both rebellion and revolution —)

"The Cabinet Ministers have been arrested and the Czar's train was held up between Petrograd and Moscow. The mutineers have appointed a new Ministry —

(Now he speaks of mutineers —)

"Milyukov has been appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs. In his first speech he said: The new Ministry has not been appointed by the people, but by the Revolution —

(This fellow Milyukov knows the difference, just as if he had studied under Professor Regéczi —)

"If the new Ministry had been appointed by the people, the country would be now at the mercy of the enemy, because the people are ignorant, do not know their own interests and would want to have the war stopped at once. But the new Ministry has been appointed by the Revolution and the Revolution is for an ultimate victory and will continue the war —

(Offhand, he could not think of a revolution which had broken out for an Ultimate Victory and for continuing a war —)

"Although, for the time being, we do not know what form of government Russia will choose for herself, one thing is certain, the present ruler will have to go, the Revolution wants Mihailovitch Alexander on the throne of the Romanovs — "

That evening, Simi Grosz scored a great success with his reading, everybody was excited, everybody was shouting at the top of his voice. Only Uncle Hegyi sat gloomily in his box and, after the ventilation, just before retiring, he spoke up in a ghastly voice:

"I'll lay three to one that we'll stay here for two more years — "

"But there is revolution in Russia! Revolution, Uncle Hegyi!"

"I heard it. The Revolution is victorious. The Revolution for the ultimate victory and for the continuation of the war — "

The next day, Captain Waletzky appeared in the camp with a radiant face and a red cockade. He himself brought in the latest number of the Amurskaya Zhizn, which was printed in red ink. Waletzky said that the true Russian soul had been victorious, that as a supreme proof of the vitality of the nation the Revolution had been triumphant, and Russia was now on her way to the laurel wreaths of victory. The way of democracy had been opened and national democracy would now lead the nation, so often bent in the interests of false principles, to the Land of Promise.

Thus spoke Waletzky, who had all of a sudden become an enthusiastic supporter of the Revolution. He proudly declared that the first tender buds of democracy had already arrived: hereafter the general will not be addressed as Your Excellency, but simply as Mr. General, the ranks will not have to salute officers on the street except when they are on duty, or in dress uniform. He hoped that the inmates of the camp would also take over a few beautiful and clever novelties, as a token of their sympathy, he would be at their service in these matters. Otherwise, no changes would take place in the camp as regards the situation of the prisoners: their rights would be respected just as before. The victorious Revolution would continue to take care of the mental and physical necessities of the prisoners, just as if nothing had happened.

"Won't there be a little freedom too?"

Captain Waletzky smiled slyly:

"We guarantee your physical and mental well-being. But if we free you, we cannot guarantee your physical well-being, and we can protect your mental well-being from the damaging influences of the Revolution only by keeping you within the fences — "

Simi Grosz read long stories every night about how the Revolution spread and how strong it was, of lively artillery fire around the Kremlin, of street fights and of the awakening of a hundred and sixty million souls, but, within the camp, everything remained silent and colorless and hopeless. It seemed that Uncle Hegyi's theory was not bad at all, the Revolution was victorious, the Revolution that had broken out for the prolongation of the war, the Revolution that had broken out for the prolongation of their captivity, the Revolution that had broken out in order to prolong the rule of Waletzky and Haertl. The Revolution which had broken out against peace and for the postponement of their return home.

They became resigned to the facts that this was Waletzky's revolution, that it was the Welfare Committee's revolution, and not a liberating revolution.

The courses continued, the captains continued to teach tactics in front of the maps, Mr. Lustig continued to graft with the milk laid aside for the sick, indoor training for the spring matches continued, Lieutenant Nagy began to carve a new box, Cornet Papp began to study a new language, First Lieutenant Held wrote home and asked for a heavy sweater for next winter. Only little bits of the great Russian Revolution seeped in through the little crevices in the fences.

For some reason or other Major Steiner was relieved and a genuine pre-war major took his place. An eternally smiling, charming old man, of whom, however, it was said that he was incredibly cunning. First Lieutenant Haertl was also relieved, although, the new major remarked, he might as well have stayed, because the warehouse was empty anyway.

CHAPTER LIX

THE new commander, Major Füzessi, was a gentle-mannered officer. He was in favor of every suggestion, he considered seriously every proposition. He never flatly refused anybody, but any one could see that, as a matter of plain fact, Major Füzessi never satisfied any request. He talked affably, suavely and benevolently. At the officers' meetings he said that he was very much satisfied with the behavior of the Corps, he found more discipline than he had expected to. But since conditions in Russia were extremely disorganized, they would have to keep together more than ever before. Anybody who set himself against the order of the camp injured the interests of the whole community.

"Since we discuss every important question at officers' meetings, and since the officers' meetings decide in everything, the greatest achievement of the Russian Revolution, that the soldiers decide their own fate, has not come to us as a surprise. The Russian colonel has promised us to protect the interests of the camp provided we maintain order. It is most important that the camp should be isolated from the outside world, as a protection against the unhealthy bacilli and the disrupting germs of the Russian Revolution. We must maintain great discipline. The Russian colonel suggested that petty offenses should be punished by our own command, for he is instructed to inflict very severe punishment in practically all instances. His suggestion is practically equal to autonomy. Of course, simple confinement to one's room is no punishment, he said, and therefore he suggested that we should fix up a cell where we could lock up the transgressors and culprits. In view of the fact that the Russian suggestion was made in the best interests of the camp, and since we realize that mere confinement is indeed a humorous punishment under the present circumstances, and since complying with this request is tantamount to autonomy, we cannot possibly neglect his suggestion. It is much better that we, ourselves, inflict punishments upon transgressing prisoners than that we let them be penalized by the Russians, who, in these turbulent days, would not hesitate to place them before a revolutionary court-martial. After all, none of us intend to do anything against discipline and order, but if anybody is so unchivalrous as to injure the interest of his brother officers, he really deserves to be thrown in the hoosegow — "

Coming as it did after this long speech, the word "hoosegow" tickled their sense of humor and they broke into laughter. The gray-haired, grave major smiled when he said "hoosegow," and when he saw that he scored a hit, he began to laugh, too. He even repeated it. Now he said: "In the coop — "

The word "coop" created even more laughter, and the officers' meeting had nothing to say against fixing up one of the rooms as a hoosegow, that is to say, as a coop.

The orders of the day that evening already contained directions regarding the prison. The room next to the study was selected and it would be transformed in the course of the next day. The orders of the day also informed them that the officer locked up in the prison would lose, for the period of his confinement, his rights which would then be exercised, in his behalf and for him, by the command.

Aspirant Bornett opined that now there were two prisons. One was the barbed-wire fence and the other one the cell. Uncle Hegyi looked up from his calculations and ironically remarked that autonomy was never given gratis. Why weren't they satisfied with the autonomy? After all if they were to be given new rights in such rapid succession they would soon be going home —

In the meantime, Simi Grosz read the wildest things from the papers. Fifteen thousand Petrograd soldiers and workers demanded the resignation of Milyukov. The front was beginning to break up. Russian soldiers charged their own artillery and forced them at the point of bayonet to cease firing. Russian commanders were resigning by scores; they had lost control over their regiments. A brigade commander, who tried to force the rebels to execute his commands with a revolver in his hand, was shot and killed by them. The soldiers looted, bombed bridges, and burned up military warehouses. The tanks attacked their own troops. Off Tarnopol, two German companies routed an entire Russian brigade.

Huge hordes of retreating soldiers streamed backwards, toward the interior of Russia, carrying banners with the inscription: "Down with War!" The First Brigade of the Russian Guards retreated without fighting and left the Petrovsky Brigade to its fate. General Selinov was unable to convince his soldiers that their ideas concerning Fatherland, Honor, Future and Liberty were base and mean. Off Tarnopol, artillery officers went down on their knees before their soldiers and begged them not to leave the guns to the enemy, but the ranks would not touch them. The regiments were all mixed up and capital punishment was restored. Tens of thousands of soldiers were plundering the homes of peaceful citizens. The highways where the retreating armies marched were lined, on both sides, by carcasses of horses, broken wagons and upturned gun-carriages. And, of course, by human corpses. In the cities, the retreating soldiers broke open the house-doors with hand grenades. The 112th Ural Regiment was fraternizing with the enemy.

The whole collapse was created by inhuman agitators who called themselves Bolsheviki, but who they were and what their program was no one knew for sure. It seemed that their leaders had been hired by the Germans, and that they were the ones who spread the ignominious slogan "Down with War." The wisest thing would be to silence these Bolsheviki, and many of them had already been arrested.

Simi Grosz read these things and the news gave them hopes for freedom. The home authorities conducting the rehabilitating procedures would most probably consider the fact that the captive officers kept themselves aloof from the revolutionary elements and maintained respect for their commanders in a most favorable light. The Russian command held up the prisoners' behavior as a model one to the Russian soldiers, and when Lieutenant Csajági once left the camp without permission everybody was highly indignant. There was self-discipline and there was self-subordination, these had to be respected, and although Lieutenant Csajági was merely reprimanded, Aspirant Klinger, who also went for a walk without permission, was punished with three days' confinement. This was the first punishment dealt out by the command. They said it was done merely to make the prisoners realize that the cell was no joke. The command's prompt action calmed the camp.

The official attitude was that the developments should be patiently watched: the prisoners had nothing to do with what the Russians were doing. Let the Russians attend to their own business. On the other hand, they couldn't very well be interested in the events at home either, because no letters from home had arrived since the Revolution, and the Russian newspapers printed but very meager news of the enemy's operations. Consequently, the thing to do was to wait patiently, completely disregarding the Revolution. There were enough goings-on in the camp anyway.

A very interesting sports meeting was in preparation. It was to include several funny numbers, too. Sack-race, a pancake-eating contest, a sprint for Old Boys, and a race for officers over fifty. Not to mention the grandiose football match which was going to be the outstanding feature of the meeting scheduled to last for three days.

Some of them suggested that it would be good if the two Budapest football players from the orderly-room could also participate in the game. These two players had been stars at home, but they were only privates, consequently, it was very doubtful whether they could participate in the officers' game. It would be very good, of course, if they could, because they were very badly needed. One of them was, incidentally, their trainer, quite an intelligent man, although only a private. Both of them were orderlies, and it was indeed inconceivable how the difficulty could possibly be solved.

A committee visited Major Füzessi and placed the problem before him. The game would gain greatly in interest if the two excellent privates could participate. Was there no way of finding a solution?

Major Füzessi listened to the delegates and then said that it was a very complicated question, but since he had the success of the games greatly at heart, he would think over the matter. He hoped he would be able to find a solution.

The next day, at the close of the officers' meeting, Major Füzessi brought up the question of the football match and said that it pleased him to know that the camp trusted him so much as to bring the matter to him. Then he announced that he had found a solution. The two privates would participate in the game, but only after satisfying certain formalities.

He did not tell them what the formalities were and some of them suggested that Major Füzessi, as the commander of a separate unit, had the right to promote the two privates to the rank of aspirant.

Thereupon others remarked that the commander of a separate unit enjoyed this right only in the firing line, and it was rather doubtful whether captivity was to be regarded as the firing line. Most probably it was because some of them who had been figuring and calculating all these years how much back pay was due them, took their pay in the firing line as the basis of their calculations —

The meeting was a huge success and exceeded all expectations. The team of the "Six" beat the combined team of the "Seven" and the "Baubezirk" 7 to 2. Indubitably, the six goals the two privates kicked helped a great deal. Major Füzessi, to the complete satisfaction of the entire camp, solved the problem in the following manner. At the beginning of the game the two privates begged to be escorted to rapport and then humbly begged the senior officer of the camp to permit them to play with the officers. The senior officer graciously granted this permission and the game started. Similarly, they again reported after the game and humbly thanked him for the permission. The Old Boys' race, in the course of which the Old Boys were to run around one of the barracks, was very amusing also. As soon as they were out of sight the audience waited in vain for them to reappear again. At last, several spectators left the stand to find out what had happened to the contestants behind the barrack. They found that the Old Boys had sat down to eat. They finished the race only after the meal. Loud laughter greeted the Old Boys when they finally appeared from behind the barrack and the third day of the Sports Festival ended with this cheerful episode. The three days' exciting amusements exhausted the prisoners and they listened sleepily, fatigued, and indifferently to Simi Grosz's reading. Anyway, Simi Grosz had been quite boring these past few days, he had been reading the same news all over again, with very little difference.

This time it was the Third Division which retreated without command, the Volunteers' Battalion was now sent against the 143rd Regiment, and the Volunteers' Battalion scored an absolute victory over the rebels, completely annihilating them —

Simi Grosz read the paper to himself because, by this time, the entire room was lost in a deep and innocent slumber. Some of them smiled seeing in their dreams the humorous race of the Old Boys....

CHAPTER LX

BEYOND the fences, the Russian Revolution raged, on Polish fields and on the Doberdo, soldiers marched with clenched fists into the trenches, but within the fences First Lieutenant Körös tenaciously hung on to his last year's garden. It was nearly a foot and a half wide and almost as long. This time he planted string beans, because last year the paprika had not been successful. The Amur inundated and tens of thousands of fat salmon got stuck in the sand when the water subsided. Captive privates in ragged uniforms, employed by the beggarly Chinese in the shacks on the river, cleaned, dried and smoked salmon for the winter. Uncle Hegyi raised only slightly the odds when some one asked him to extend the time-limit. To get home within five years was not an exaggerated hope any more. The Welfare Committee's warehouse was empty, Almoslino came only because it was his habit, but he never brought any mail. The Russian guards spoke disrespectfully to Waletzky and the Russian colonel was nowhere to be seen. Kerensky was still in power, he even prepared for a great summer offensive, but the small Kerensky-rubles, the new money which was about as large as two stamps put together, was steadily losing its value. Some of them said that this was because the banknote was so small and the Russian people had no confidence in small notes, but the experts contended that the value of a banknote did not depend on its size. One could not understand on what the value of the banknote depended, because the Czarist rubles were also losing their value.

The summer was full of excitement and hopes for an early peace, but news came only of destructions and rebellions. And of the great offensive Kerensky was preparing. Consuls Heedbloom and Conger occasionally visited them, but they had nothing interesting to say and, shrugging their shoulders, refused all requests. They said the warehouses were empty, everything was distributed, there was no money, no clothes, no marmalade, no pulverized eggs, no nail clippers. They said that the prisoners should have been more thrifty, it was unwise to distribute everything. If things continued the way they were, they too would go home to their respective countries. The prisoners should be glad that at least their lives were safe. It was good to be among four walls in these turbulent days.

There were sour tennis tournaments in the yard and malicious remarks flew hither and thither. Wasserlauf noticed that Csányi scratched himself while playing tennis. He remarked that men who had lice shouldn't play tennis.

The Russians gave them nothing but salmon to eat.

They hated it, they shuddered even at the thought of salmon.

Small private kitchens were established and, at noontime, fires were burning all over the camp. The food of these private kitchens was better than even their former food, despite the fact that the money was worth less and less day after day. They occasionally got hold of some beans, lentils, and tins, and sometimes even of a few pounds of pork, and when they ate the meat with lots of fried onions they could not smell the odor of salmon so badly. For the hogs were more than ever fed on salmon only. Dorogi always cooked more than he needed and sold the remaining portions. This got him in trouble, the command summoned him and asked him to prove that he made no profit on the sales. Officers were not permitted to work for profit and it seemed that Dorogi could not wholly disprove the charge, because he was forbidden to cook.

They took recourse to the funds, because that was the only way somehow to keep up the standard of the mess. Only one fund was exempt, the fund out of which they hoped to cover the expenses of the trip home.

This was sacred and no one would have thought of taking even one kopeck out of it.

The actresses came back empty-handed from the dispensary, not even they could get anything. Neither dates nor figs, nor preserves nor eggs.

When they were taken to the bath they met the miserable privates again, as always when they went down to the river. There was a ditch near the camp, for the kitchen refuse, and as they passed by the ditch two broken ruins, two shadows of men, turned toward them. They were picking rubbish in the ditch and when they noticed the officers they stretched out their hands, begging. With their other hands they pressed something against their naked chests. When they got nearer they saw that what they pressed against their chests were potato peels and rotting vegetables. They dug them out of the ditch. A piece of dry crust was treasure to them, to the orphans who could not get in a hospital, who were so weak that even the Chinese refused to hire them, who could not even fish, who could do nothing but rummage on a dunghill, feverish and dying.

A few coins fell into their outstretched palms and the officers decided that the camp, such as it was, was still better than nothing.

The economic crisis came practically without any warning. The invisible power which had hitherto just poured goods upon them became very tight-fisted of a sudden. Money, of course, was the same, the pay was the same, their only trouble was that everything had become dearer.

"I wish Kerensky would win — "

"Aren't you ashamed of yourself? Against your own country?"

"Against my own country! The war has got to end some day! And I'd like to know why we need the Ukraine? Why do we need Warsaw? Do they want to conquer the whole of Russia? Do they want to advance sixteen thousand kilometers? Do the troops of the Central Powers want to enter triumphantly into Irkutsk? Do they want to sign the Armistice in Irkutsk? How do they want to conquer Russia? Lengthwise? To Vladivostok? Or breadthwise? From the Arctic Sea to Persia? Eh?

"But why do you need Kerensky's victory?"

"Well, perhaps then this rotten Kerensky money would be worth more."

"Shame — "

"Why shame? The major drinks chocolate every morning — chocolate made of condensed milk — "

The news of the condensed milk and the chocolate spread in the camp. It reached the major's ears. At the next officers' meeting, he brought it up.

"There may be some who are sicker than I am and are in need of more health-giving food than what they get. They may take exception to the fact that I have to follow doctor's orders and drink chocolate and condensed milk. Alas, my protests were of no avail, in vain I begged the doctor to leave me alone, he would not listen to me. I told him I am a soldier, I can get along very well without chocolate and condensed milk, let some one else who needs them more than I do get them. But, my friends, I protested in vain, the doctor said that old men have to drink milk, and he forced me to accept them. But I'd like to know the opinion of the officers' meeting whether it is in the interests of the community that I be kept alive; I'd like to know the opinion of the camp whether it is necessary for me to give up the chocolate and the condensed milk. An old man like myself — "

There were tears in their eyes and they would not let the major go on. They unanimously voted him the chocolate and the condensed milk.

They consoled themselves with the lives of the privates. It was possible to live without condensed milk and chocolate. They told tales of the sufferings of the privates, that was how they consoled each other. After all, their present food was not so very bad, it was even better than what the ranks got at home.

Lieutenant Horváth had finished a beautiful inlaid work. He called it "Little Father." "Little Father" was a Russian mujik, and Lieutenant Horváth copied him out of a Russian illustrated weekly, the Argus. The old Russian was made out of all sorts of colored chips of wood, and he was serving as the top of a handsome carved box. One day Lieutenant Horváth asked permission to go to town and when he got home he no longer had the box. But he brought home some sausages and several pounds of beans and Siberian lentils.

The command immediately ordered an investigation and Lieutenant Horváth walked around dejectedly for several days.

Then the matter was taken to the officers' meeting.

The investigation took place because both the "Little Father" and the sausages had been reported to the command. They had been reported in such a manner that the command was under the impression that Lieutenant Horváth had sold the box and had bought food with the money.

The command again declared most emphatically that officers should not sell their handiwork for profit, should not take salaried employment, consequently, and quite obviously, should not prepare anything for which they expected to be paid with money. And Lieutenant Horváth was charged with selling his handiwork.

The investigation brought to light the fact that the charge in its original form was not quite true. Lieutenant Horváth proved that he had merely exchanged the box for food. Essentially this amounted to a sale, but in view of the fact that it was not quite so, the command merely severely reprimanded Lieutenant Horváth and ordered him to pay to the Mess Fund an amount equal to the value of the food for which he had exchanged the box. The command then again definitely prohibited the officers to play tricks with Army Regulations in such a manner.

The officers could not possibly do such a thing. It would be most deplorable if discipline hitherto so nicely maintained should be destroyed just before the return home. Things could not be solved so simply. It would be indeed very nice if all of them could all of a sudden start making boxes or hire themselves out to the Russians for all sorts of work. Why, in that case the engineers could simply go to work in ammunition factories, and where would this lead to? Why, then we, ourselves, would help the enemy to defeat our own country. The prohibition of such work was therefore of great moral significance, not only because it tended to preserve the prestige of the Officers' Corps. It would be downright high treason for us, with our work, to help the Russian Army in any manner or way whatsoever....

CHAPTER LXI

WHERE were the beautiful days of spring, the merry sports meetings, where the days of plenty, the pineapple preserves, the arguments over artistic problems? The last sign of the prosperity of the camp was the Old Boys' race, it was the last of the unalloyed pleasures, the last not yet ruined by cruel need. The Amur still poured forth salmon, but even the sight of it filled them with nausea. To be sure, there was no famine yet, for there was plenty of fish, but everything else was about to disappear. The pay was often late and, toward the end of summer, it stopped completely.

The mess-officers told them confidentially and under oath that they were able to give even this considerably deteriorated food only because recourse had been taken to the secret funds. Money for winter wood and oil had also been taken out of the secret funds. The Russians could not be depended on for anything any more. And fifty rubles were worth only about one-third of what they had been worth a year before.

Lieutenant Gotthilf rose to eminence these days. Lieutenant Gotthilf was a Zionist and he maintained relations with a private who was also a Zionist. This private had married in Khabarovsk and he had a prosperous barber shop in the heart of the city. He extended small loans to those who were recommended to him by Gotthilf. But this lasted only for a few days, because Gotthilf was soon accused of treachery; they said he helped the hussar officers and aristocrats and not the Jews, whereupon Gotthilf declared that he was insulted and stopped recommending anybody.

Neither letters nor news came from home, and there was little in the Russian papers. It was high time for the messengers of an early peace to arrive. There were several among them who had been spending their fourth summer in this hopeless captivity.

They staggered about all summer like flies in winter, in a bitter state of semi-drowsiness, filled with hopeless indifference. No one went to see the performance of "Typhoon," although it was an excellent production. Japanese from Khabarovsk staged the Japanese ceremonies and loaned the ancient, heavy silk kimonos to the characters.

Everybody was putting his little belongings, his notes in order, they all wanted to be ready when redemption came. They waited as never before for the soft-cushioned trains, in whose soft lap they were hoping to find rest.

First Lieutenant Körös's little garden bloomed for the last time, the pupils in Professor Julius Papp's box conjugated the last verbs, Bartakovics no longer examined Dr. Szalay to ascertain what progress he had made in the new Criminal Code, and Regimental Surgeon Szabo would soon finish his endless casino game with Jóska Kaufmann. The poor Pick had already written home that he would like to have back his job as Assistant County Clerk, the rich Pick loudly announced that he would make a thorough house-cleaning in his lumber-yard. Répássy at last finished the sliding rule on which he had been working for the past year and a half, Aspirant Juhász was feverishly copying the camp poems which he expected to recite at home at amateur theatricals. Many of them made peace with their enemies in the last moment and liquidated their affairs of honor in order that they should not be brought to a court of honor at home. Dantsek, the magician, tidied his workshop, and the book-bindery was busy binding the published numbers of the Siberian Gazette and the Agitator. The reservists even forgave the Regulars, the cavalry officers, and the aristocrats for their secret funds; they would not enjoy them for long anyway. Lányi collected subscriptions to a book to be written by one of the camp authors entitled "Messages from Far Away," the price would have to be paid only at home —

Thus passed the summer and, true to Siberian custom, the three-day Siberian autumn was all at once upon them. On the 20th of September, Captain Glattstein was still doing setting-up exercises early in the morning, as was his wont, all naked, but three days later it was snowing, and on the first of October everything was white. There was snow everywhere. Snow, Siberian, merciless and indomitable snow, snow which never thawed until late in the spring, snow which never aroused in them desires for the joys of winter, snow which spread out over hundreds of thousands of acres, snow, in which all the prisoners' hopes were drowned, snow no one could wade across, snow only the legendary train they were awaiting and which did not want to come, could possibly conquer. One could not wrestle with snow, not with the Siberian snow, the Siberian snow was an invincible enemy, and all hopes were put away until the spring. Only the buran blew over the steppes. They had to wait for spring.

They had to wait for the spring again, and they again began conjugating the verbs, and it seemed that "Jerusalem," the passion play by Máté Zalka, would, after all, be produced. Although something was going on in the world. Simi Grosz read the paper and it seemed something was going on!

"The Committee of the 12th Army, completely aware of the grave situation on the Northern Front, once more turns to the Empire, the People and the Government! All the achievements of the Revolution are at stake! Political and economical bankruptcy threatens the country and not one point of the program of the Revolution has been fulfilled! Internal politics are in a turmoil, and there is no unity in the foreign policy! The ruling classes' selfish desire for wealth is a red rag in the eyes of the working masses! Party interests and party struggles have reached the limit and are now verging on the edge of ordinary criminal acts! We are threatened with falling to pieces and the Counter-Revolution is gaining apace! The Fleet and Army of German imperialism are preparing a new blow, the Empire is in great danger! And when we call on our soldiers to fight to the last drop of blood, we know very well that we call on naked men!"

There was anxiety on Waletzky's face and he came to the camp very often, sometimes with an escort, but more often alone, and in secret. He held long conversations with the commander. It was said that Waletzky had picked up a lot for himself, that his wallet was bulging with money embezzled from the camp, and that he was about to escape to America. News from the West became more and more encouraging, it seemed the Russians would not be able to hold out much longer, but how long yet?

It was not hard to maintain discipline in the camp. There were no more endless conversations, no one wanted anything, all of them surrendered to Fate, there was nothing to argue about, nothing could be helped anyway. Although the gates were not open as yet, the Russian guard would let out anybody for a few kopecks, and although anybody could go wherever he pleased, no one felt like going. And no one noticed that Aspirant Pászkándy had been away for a week.

Only when he returned did they notice that he had been out. His box-mates had said that he had gone away, but no one had cared to find out where to. This fellow Pászkándy was a sturdy, shrewd-eyed, clever young man, he rarely spoke much and never cared for the affairs of the camp. He must have been twenty-six or twenty-eight years old. Had he not carried the insignia of an aspirant, one would have thought that he was the haughty eldest son of a rich peasant, or, perhaps, his foreman. He talked in a peasant dialect, smoked a long pipe, used phrases quite unknown to city folk, and cursed a lot. But his curses were not bookish, they were good, saucy, original, peasant curses, genuine curses, which really made one angry, but whenever Pászkándy noticed that some one felt insulted, he slyly raised his eyebrows and smiled, and then you could see that he was merely joking.

When he arrived, he was tired and worn out. They asked him where he had been and what he had been doing.

As was his wont, he first smiled in his cunning manner, then said:

"I was over there in China, I heard there was good earth over there, I went over to see what kind of earth it was. It is fine. You can do with it whatever you want. I stopped with a Russian family and I think I am going to marry in the family. I'd have been married by this time, anyway, if I hadn't been drafted. The farmer has a good-looking daughter and they live among the Chinese very peacefully. Only there aren't many Russians over there. They were very glad to see me. I told them I was a Hungarian, but that didn't make much difference with them. They'll let me marry Marusa, they are glad that I'm going to marry her. We'll wait until everything will be in order and then we'll come back to Siberia. I told them I wouldn't mind staying there either, the Chinese are peaceful folk and the soil is the same everywhere. Well, we'll see. I haven't got anybody at home, here I'm going to have land and farm, I'll be my own master. I'll have such a farm that the Chinese will come from near and far to wonder at it. They can teach me a lot of things and I can teach them a lot of things. Have you ever heard anything like this, they hoe the wheat! And they say it has ears as fat as my fist and a very long stalk. I'm very anxious to find out whether that's true. I'll find it out next year. And now I'm going to leave you — God help you home — "

"You're crazy, Pászkándy. Why? You could get a rich peasant girl at home, too, you don't have to go to China for that! If you'd only stay here in Russia — "

"At home? You are crazy yourself. How could I marry a peasant girl at home? I, De Pászkándy, a nobleman? At the most, I could marry a postmistress, and I myself should have to take a small clerical job with the county administration. Just leave it to me, I know what I'm doing. And then again, where is that going home of yours, how far away is it yet — I don't want to wait any longer, I want to hoe and plow next summer. We have three thousand sheep and forty oxen — can you tell me what farmer has that many at home? And the man who has that many isn't waiting for me to marry his daughter! "

Some one informed the command of Pászkándy's plan and he was escorted to rapport. The major reprimanded him for entertaining such ideas. It was the duty of the command to look after every man and to prevent such madness. For the time being, he would get three days' solitary confinement. He would forget his adventurous ideas in the cell.

Pászkándy was locked up and the guards were given strict orders not to let him pass the gate.

Pászkándy smiled and the iron bars of the cell's window were found loosened the next morning. The prisoner had vanished from the camp....

CHAPTER LXII

PASZKANDY'S escape was the last transgression committed in the camp. Venice fell and the Bolsheviki triumphed in Moscow, and these two events greatly strengthened the faith in the command. The fall of Venice was celebrated with a dinner. The dinner was given by the command and the expenses were covered from the secret funds. A delegate from the "Baubezirk" delivered a speech which was roundly applauded, the applause was especially deafening when he said: "Our enemies lie crushed at our victorious feet — "

The fall of Venice proved that military discipline and unity had brought the desired fruits, that manly virtues had been triumphant, that absolute faith and trust in the Supreme Command had been victorious. On the other hand, the Bolshevik program, which culminated in the slogan "Down with War," brought about the complete collapse of the Russian armies. Soon the gigantic Russian forces would be completely disrupted, and then the prisoners could go home. Then they would certainly have to render an account of their acts in captivity and the soldiers who achieved the splendid victories would certainly know how to deal with those who were undermining authority, discipline and order.

That was why these two events were of such great importance from the point of view of the camp, although no new orders, no new warnings were necessary. The Bolsheviki's victory and the fall of Venice were the glorious triumphs of the camp-command's foreign policy. On the one side, there was the great example of military virtues, and on the other, the warning finger of disorder and lack of discipline. Lo, the terrifying Russian armies had collapsed and the country was at the mercy of the victors. The Bolsheviki would beg for peace now, but it would be a humiliating peace. The terms were to be dictated by the victors.

"It would be too bad if we were not able to maintain order among ourselves. The Russians neglect us, they don't care for us. If we don't keep together, if we don't watch out, we shall fall apart like sheaves cut open — "

It was incredible what the Russians did. Waletzky staggered about with a grotesque grin on his lips, he loitered about quite helplessly, one could almost say he stole his way about the camp. He displayed no insignia of his rank, indeed, sometimes he appeared in civilian clothes. He no longer gave commands, he was just curious to know what was going to happen.

The Russian soldiers no longer obeyed him. One day, there was only one single guard at the gate, the rest of them were on strike, and when the command sent for Waletzky, he simply did not want to come. He told them to let him alone.

But they could not very well let it go at that and the commanders of the three camps went into a conference. And when Waletzky continued to disregard their repeated requests, and did not want to come, they got in touch with a first lieutenant, who had hitherto been in charge of the guard only.

The first lieutenant was a Russian and, so it seemed, he knew more about the situation than the Polish Waletzky. He declared himself willing to take over the command of the camps in behalf of the Russians, but only if the prisoners would take care of his and the soldiers' pay.

The commanders of the three camps, after long and embittered arguments, finally reached a solution.

Now they saw how good it was to have the funds.

They bribed the Khabarovsk military authorities and the Russians expressed willingness to continue to pay the prisoners as well as the first lieutenant. But the Russians would not hear of paying the guard under any circumstances. They said they did not want to deal with soldiers. They were ready to give uniforms and arms, but they did not want either to give commands to them or to talk with them. Finally, the question was solved with the help of the first lieutenant, a very clever man. He recruited deserters who dared not go home to European Russia because of the winter. These mercenaries were ready to guard the camp for food, some underwear, and a little money. The officers' meeting unanimously voted the expenses and the camp at last had guards.

Some suggested that the mercenaries could have been recruited from among their own miserable soldiers, too. The suggestion, however, was wholly impossible. The command did not want so to humiliate the captive privates as to give them arms to guard their own officers. And then again, they would have been unable to maintain order for, as a matter of plain fact, every single prisoner would have been the superior of his own guard. The Russian first lieutenant's idea proved to be excellent, the paid guards behaved very nicely, they didn't want to risk their jobs, not until the spring anyway.

Thus the winter passed and captive fingers again glided over the keys of blind pianos, and the wireless telegraph machines of the boxes, sending no messages anywhere and bringing none, were rattling again. Some of them were even thinking up new ideas.

Norbert Siska, for instance, transformed his box into a medieval, fortified castle. He had been working on it for three years and at last it was ready now. Cardboard walls, with crenels and a drawbridge, surrounded the box. Iron bolts were painted on the cardboard door, and when the master was at home, the tower flew a banner decorated with the family coat-of-arms. When a visitor arrived, he first knocked on the door with a halberd hanging on a chain woven out of rope and then waited until the major-domo, after ascertaining by looking through an iron-barred peeping hole that the visitor was a friend, let down the drawbridge. When the banner was not raised no one could enter, the major-domo would not let anybody in: the master was not home, he was patrolling the countryside with his faithful halberdiers.

At night, Simi Grosz read about the one hundred and fifty-three fronts of the Russian civil war, of the fights in Moscow and in the provinces, of the advance of the victorious troops of the Central Powers, and of the Bolsheviki's constantly repeated offers of peace.

On the whole, the prisoners were willing to sign the peace, but the command gravely weighed the chances and held out for reparations. Now that victory is in our hands, it would be too bad if we should let its advantages pass out of our grasp. Such an opportunity will not soon offer itself again and the Russians will have to pay for our losses in men, money and equipment. In money, or in kind, or, possibly, in territory, but reparations will have to be paid.

But it was not Simi Grosz who read to them the news of the peace of Brest-Litovsk. One day Cornet Orosz came earlier than usual with the orders of the day. He came immediately after lunch and before there was time to be surprised at this unusual occurrence he was already reading a brief account of the great event. The command informed them that the Central Powers had signed a separate peace treaty with Russia, and, therefore, the command advised the prisoners to prepare themselves for their return home which, it was to be expected, would soon follow the signing of peace. Of course, the Russian papers announced only very briefly the for them deplorable news, hence the command was in no position to inform them of the terms. If, however, the news was reliable, the Dual Monarchy would get Russian Poland in lieu of reparations.

Uncle Hegyi said that he would not believe it until after the trains took him home and put him down at Homonna or Kassa. Norbert Siska immediately raised the banner with the coat-of-arms, Cornet Juhász hurled his cap in the air, and Lieutenant Schenk, for the first time after so many melancholy years, strummed a military march on his guitar. The boxes were swarming with excitement, the men started to pack, the price of dictionaries, books, paints, brushes and balalaikas suddenly dropped. Only the last named was somewhat in demand because there were many who wanted to take them home as souvenirs.

But the news of the peace of Brest-Litovsk did not cause unalloyed joy. At first they didn't even notice it, but then an Austrian aspirant's remark created unpleasant excitement:

"Weiter dienen, Kameraden —"

That was true. If there was only separate peace they would have to go on. The various other fronts were still there. They would still have to go to the Italian, or to the French, front. Why, going home would be worse than staying here! Anton Klehr immediately declared that he had not the slightest intention of going home, he would have plenty of time to do so after the whole thing was safely over. As a matter of fact, the peace came at a most inopportune time. A separate peace had no sense at all, if there was peace, why wasn't there peace everywhere, this was no real peace, this meant peace to the Russian soldiers only. Everybody was excited, rebellious, and many bitter remarks were heard against the command: "The command will take advantage of the situation. The peace is only the beginning of discipline. The command will render such reports as it likes and those who are at odds with the clique will be immediately sent to the front."

The men were embittered and went to bed distressed. The anxious silence was suddenly broken by First Lieutenant Wecker's stentorian voice:

"What are the revolutionaries going to do now? Why are they so silent?"

And it was also First Lieutenant Wecker who informed them the next day, with considerable malice in his voice, that the command had summoned Waletzky, that Waletzky, hiding in Khabarovsk, had refused to come, and that a patrol, composed of Russian soldiers, of mercenaries, had been sent for him. The command wished to explain to Waletzky that inasmuch as the peace treaty gave Warsaw to the Central Powers, he as a Pole now belonged in the camp. Waletzky was informed that he could no longer be treated as an exception, such action would create ill-feeling, and he was bidden to move to the camp at once.

The affair took a surprising turn. Waletzky acknowledged the command's wish and gave his word of honor that as soon as he could attend to his affairs, that is to say, within two days, he would move to the "Baubezirk" and share the fate of the other prisoners of war.

But, in two days, there was no trace of Waletzky; he had fled with his family to America. It would have been indeed highly unwise for him to go to Warsaw where we were the masters and where he would have had to answer for his misdeeds. . . .

As soon as the cold abated, enterprising Chinamen appeared outside of the camp and began to build small shacks. Primitive, wooden shacks. They had heard that the prisoners were now permitted to go down to the village and they fitted out these shacks as diminutive bawdyhouses. The command warned the younger gentlemen of the dangers inherent in the visits to these shacks, nevertheless, there was a constant pilgrimage going on. A first lieutenant took down all his belongings to one of the shacks and hired it for a full day. He paid with his overcoat, his Chinese quilt, all his Baikal picture cards, with everything he had, but the Chinaman wanted more. And he took the first lieutenant's notebooks, too, and his forty sheets of clean paper, for one day's rental.

When his day was up, the first lieutenant was cold, sick and tired, but he said that now he would not mind even if he died. It was worth it. The command held him up as an example and pointed out the sad consequences of senseless license, but the exodus went on. They went down in hordes, and the belongings of the prisoners diminished rapidly. Some of them made incredible purchases. Cornet Leehr, for instance, wasted three pairs of underwear on a Buddha statue. An enterprising Chinaman sold it to him in the village. But all this would not have been so bad had the case of Andor Mohay not come up.

Andor Mohay was a settled, dignified, and disciplined man, he was proud of his commission as captain in the Reserve Corps, but the sudden liberty went to his head. He did not need to pay for the trysts with Chinese quilts and winter boots, because he had sewed gold twenty-kronen pieces in his collar before he had left home. Everybody knew that Andor Mohay's threadbare tunic was worth more than Cornet Bleiweiss' silver-fox coat. Now he merely took a few gold pieces out of his collar and went down to the Ussuri three days in succession. Nothing would have happened had Mohay not gotten drunk on the third day. The news that he was drunk spread like wildfire, and many of them ran to the gate to watch him coming home reeling, with scrambled eggs all over his pants. The Chinaman wanted to clean them, but he wouldn't let him do it. He said to the Chinaman:

"Let it be, do you think I am ashamed of it? Do you think it's a shame to eat scrambled eggs?"

Thus Mr. Mohay came home after his great debauch, but Major Füzessi heard of the scandal and went down to the gate to meet him. He wanted to take him to his own room so that he should not have to go through the big rooms, he wanted to keep the scandalous incident a secret from the younger gentlemen.

But Mr. Mohay was in high spirits and he pushed the major out of his way:

"What's that, brother? Are you all like the Chinaman? Is it so shameful to eat scrambled eggs nowadays, eh? Get out of my way — "

They could not restrain him. He tottered around the camp and proudly boasted to everybody of the scrambled eggs. True, scrambled eggs had become a smart dish, and they were as envious of him as if he had boasted of a twenty-carat diamond.

But the command took the scandal to heart and although Andor Mohay, Captain in the Reserve Corps, got away very lightly — he proved that he had committed the grave breach of discipline in an unconscious state of mind — leaves were now less easily granted. Especially the younger gentlemen were being looked after, although they could go for walks only, because they had neither money nor belongings to spare. The younger gentlemen were the ones to suffer despite the fact that most of the outrages had been committed by the older element.

CHAPTER LXIII

AS spring advanced, more and more prisoners disappeared. Not many compared to the many thousands of them, but, all of a sudden, Béla Fábián was nowhere to be seen, and Vidor Elek, editor of the Siberian Az Est, the newspaper in the "Seven," had also vanished. What hurt them most was that the runaways had said nothing of their plans to anybody. One day they had been talking with them and the next day they were already on their way home. One could only suspect that they had raised money somewhere, perhaps in the Khabarovsk pharmacy. Their sudden disappearance was most unpleasant to their friends and box-mates, they had to listen to malicious remarks, such as: "Why didn't he tell you anything about it? He is your best friend, why didn't he take you along too?"

Jóska Kaufmann made no secret of his departure. He politely informed them that he was about to go, ordered a Chinaman to wait for him at the gate of the camp with a wagon, took leave of his friends, and, with incredible calmness, announced that he had to go to the station now, because he wouldn't like to miss the train. Of course everybody laughed. They thought he was joking. What did it matter now whether he left in a day or in a week? But no! Jóska Kaufmann, so those who accompanied him to the station to see him off related, bought himself cigars and papers, sat down in a second-class compartment, lighted a cigar, opened a paper, looked at his watch and said:

"Can it be that the train is late?"

Incredible! He went home from Siberia as if he had gone on a business trip just over to Halmi. It seemed so utterly implausible that anybody who wanted to go home needed nothing but money and then could board a train at once. Going home had been such a distant dream for years that all this seemed like a bad joke. They shook their heads even at the letters the returning comrades had sent from Moscow. The whole thing seemed so desperate that only a few men dared undertake it. It was contrary to all reason that it should be so easy and simple — It was simply impossible —

The command did not prohibit them from going home. Anybody could go who proved that he had the money. Of course some of them had so much money that even if it had been prohibited they could have bribed everybody and left the camp with ease. But there was another reason for the command's lax attitude. All over eastern Siberia, the Reds were already masters and it was an open secret that the Reds were willing to listen to complaints against the command. The Reds were just aching to interfere with the internal affairs of the camp. Indeed, it was more than a mere rumor because, one day, Tovarishch Nasok, with a huge red button on his chest, a red ribbon on his arm and a red cockade on his cap, appeared in the camp.

Tovarishch Nasok was a well built, good-humored, half intelligent Russian worker, a clever, shrewd man. He was not irascible at all. Jovially he gave orders that he wanted to speak to the prisoners.

The major referred to the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, which acknowledged the Central Powers as victors, and protested by the right of the victor against the Bolsheviki's intention of contaminating the spirit of the camp with Red propaganda. The internal affairs of every country are sacred and he would not let anybody interfere with them.

Tovarishch Nasok did not fly into a rage. He said he was not quite sure whether the Brest-Litovsk Treaty included this, but he, as Commissar of the Amur Province, ordered the meeting to be held. The major might defend himself at home by saying that he surrendered only to force and that he protested. He realized that it was the major's duty to protest and he would not hold that against him. He shouldered all responsibility for whatever consequences might follow as a result of impairing the Brest-Litovsk Treaty. The major realized the truth of this and ordered the officers to gather.

The camp was trembling with excitement when Tovarishch Nasok climbed on a table in the study and, in a heated, passionate, stirring voice, addressed the ragged, musty, and worn prisoners of war:

"The flame of the Revolution is burning high in Russia and the Revolution is ready to embrace you too who were prisoners here under the Czar's yoke. It brings you freedom and it is willing to place the keys of your prison in your own hands.

"From the western border of Russia to Vladivostok, the prisoners of the past may now fly out of the jails, fly through the tormenting iron bars, they may soar freely over the free Russian fields. All our former enemies who have been suffering in the murderous prisons of Omsk, Tomsk, Irkutsk, Khabarovsk, Stretensk, Krasnoyarsk, Berezovka and Troitsk, may now leave their dungeons. They were our enemies but now they are our brothers protected by the flag of Liberty — "

Three timid hurrahs were heard at this point and the speaker looked around, somewhat embarrassed. He thought the prisoners would shed tears of happiness and he was disagreeably surprised.

But then he realized what the trouble was. He smiled. Of course, only a few of the prisoners understood what he was saying. He dropped his oratorical tone and asked in his ordinary voice whether anybody who spoke Russian would kindly interpret his speech. The major immediately winked to a captain, the captain winked back, and began to translate Tovarishch Nasok's speech:

"The Commissar assures the prisoners of his best intentions. He is very satisfied with your behavior and is especially glad to see that you have kept yourself aloof from things which are none of your business. The hour of liberation is at hand and if you continue to respect discipline and obey your commanders you will soon be off on your way home. The prisoners who have been suffering in the camps of Omsk, Tomsk, Irkutsk, Khabarovsk, Stretensk, Krasnoyarsk, Berezovka and Troitsk will soon start to go home, to join their beloved at home — "

The officers responded with enthusiastic cheers and Tovarishch Nasok continued with tears in his voice:

"Don't your hearts beat faster when you see the self-sacrificing armies who fight for liberty in Russia, when you see the awakening consciousness of a people throwing off their yoke? This is a historical moment, for the peoples of the world rise with elementary force and break the physical and spiritual locks of their jails!"

Tovarishch Nasok stopped so that the captain could interpret his words.

"Don't your hearts beat faster at the thought of being again able to grasp the sword twisted out of your hands, at the thought of once more proudly marching — "

At this point something happened. Simi Grosz smiled and Tovarishch Nasok immediately noticed this involuntary expression of amusement.

He became sad, beckoned to Simi Grosz, and took out his revolver.

"I command you to translate word for word the following: My words have been falsely interpreted to you. Translate it!"

Simi Grosz translated:

"Mr. Nasok forces me at the point of a revolver to translate to you that what he said was not interpreted correctly to you."

Tovarishch Nasok watched the faces and he saw that Simi Grosz stammered the truth. He continued:

"Translate to the prisoners that they are so suppressed that I cannot hope that they will ever understand my words. Say it!"

Simi Grosz said it and Tovarishch Nasok continued:

"Tell them that I have nothing to say to slaves, let them keep their chains. I neither like them nor am I angry at them. They simply don't matter. Say it!"

Simi Grosz said that too. Tovarishch Nasok continued:

"Tell them, God help them back to the slaughterhouse. I hope they will soon be there — "

He had to say it, because Nasok had a revolver in his hand and because he watched the eyes and the faces.

Tovarishch Nasok bowed and went away. He did not even turn his head.

When the revolutionary left, Major Füzessi rose to speak. He gave thanks to God that the Russian had been unsuccessful, he praised the self-control of the prisoners who had restrained themselves from insulting the demagogue. Such an irresponsible revolutionary might have carried away some of the prisoners, especially the younger gentlemen, he might have led them in some adventurous enterprise. Indeed, the Russian had been right, the war was still going on at home, and he hoped that soon the noble steel would once more glisten pure and clean in their liberated hands on the field of honor.

The prisoners responded with enthusiastic applause, cheers and hurrahs to the brave major's words.

The meeting was now transformed into an officers' meeting and he continued his speech in his capacity as commander of the camp.

"The command strictly prohibits the prisoners to undertake the so-called going home. It is doubtful whether such experiments would be successful, but even if they were, it doesn't make much difference because we must act together and in the interest of the community. Isolated experiments are no help to the community. For the next two weeks, leaves will be issued only moderately because, I may as well inform you in all confidence, the commander of the three camps will escape this week. He is fully equipped with all the necessities for an escape, consequently he will be successful and as soon as he gets home he will be able to help us. This is his aim. Either all of us or none! The commander of the three camps, Colonel Mitteräger, will escape in order to help all of us home. Of course, the command will continue to do everything in its power to find ways and means to help all of us home."

CHAPTER LXIV

IT seemed that the Amurskaya Zhizn also lived on Lavka-news. Half of the paper was full of news which the other half denied. One could not find out at all what was true and what was not. Now it said that General Hoffmann was advancing on Moscow at the head of the White Guard. Another telegram said that the Germans crossed the new border line, that they did not respect the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, and that the populace was receiving them everywhere with joy. They didn't know why the Germans crossed the border and who General Hoffmann was. To judge by his name, he was a German, but, in that case, what was he doing in Pskov? The paper was a mess of pell-mell news, as if it had been compiled from gossip picked up by the refugees who stopped in the city for a few days on their way to the East. The command warned them not to believe the news and telegrams of the Amurskaya Zhizn unreservedly because one of its greatest sensations duly celebrated by the camp, namely, the fall of Venice, proved to be untrue.

The command accepted but one certain fact: the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk. Of course, with the modification that Warsaw would not be given to the Monarchy in lieu of reparations but that there would be an independent Polish Republic.

The future of the camp, therefore, rested on the treaty and, after a while, the Russians also accepted this as a fact. The overwhelming majority of the camp behaved accordingly. This meant that one could not very well become friendly with smugglers on the Amur as Waletzky had done. They had to behave like officers because the treaty had strengthened discipline at home.

Tovarishch Nasok might have been right about the slaughterhouse, nevertheless they were not surprised to hear that Rittmeister Liev had been highly insulted when a lieutenant had addressed him as captain.

To sum it up: the camp accepted the peace of Brest-Litovsk as a fact. The Russian authorities in the Amur Province also accepted this fact as the basis of negotiations. Consequently the prisoners had the right to go home. On the other hand the prisoners were supposed to obey their commanders even more than before. It was only logical therefore that First Lieutenant Páll could not possibly let Lieutenant Kresméry salute him with his left hand and ordered him to repeat the salute correctly.

Neither could one ask where the colonel got the money to go home. Was it given to him from the secret funds? It could not be asked, however, because his escape was no longer considered as a private affair but as an act done in the service of the Fatherland. For it was of utmost importance that the prisoners, eighty per cent of whom were fit to continue the fight, should get home as soon as possible.

The colonel took with him a fountain pen filled with a chemical ink and his letters had only to be warmed to find out that he was proceeding according to schedule.

Of course, the command was not waiting idly in the meantime. With the help of the remaining secret funds and stores, and with the aid of Heedbloom and Conger, they convinced the military authorities of Khabarovsk that there was no sense in keeping them there. And long before help from home could have arrived, barely two weeks after the departure of the colonel, it was agreed that a thousand men would be sent home at once. The gates were thrown open once more, the command gave full freedom to everybody. Anybody who wanted to go by himself was permitted to do so. Similarly, whoever wanted to remain in the city until the departure of the next transport might do so also.

Finally, in the middle of April, on an unforgettable day, reports came from the station that several cattle cars had arrived. Indubitably, they were for the prisoners.

An officers' meeting was held and Major Füzessi, deeply moved, informed them that the first transport would start in two days.

"Hurrah!" yelled the prisoners, but Major Füzessi disapprovingly shook his gray head and said:

"You shouldn't say 'Hurrah,' my boys, you should say, 'Thank God' — "

The prisoners yelled, "Thank God," and in two days, they actually left the camp behind where but a few months ago the deserter Waletzky had been their supreme commander.

The dream-train was racing with them homeward, the magic train was taking them home. It had no soft cushions and the chilly wind of the Siberian spring blew in through the cracks. But it was homeward bound....

The cattle cars were stolen or grafted, they slept on shelves one above another, the brakes were broken, the axles rusty, but they were homeward bound....

Everything was left behind, in the intoxication of going home they forgave each other everything, and trembling and shuddering they watched out that nothing should stop them.

They put their own men on the engine to control and supervise the drunken Russian engineers and brakemen. They were immediately promoted and they were promised that they would be richly rewarded at home for their brave behavior in the enemy country.

The train raced madly down the slopes of the Stretenska hills, it raced wildly down breath-taking curves, down toward the steppe. Then, all of a sudden, in the middle of the night, Schnabel, in one of the center cars, began to swing a burning torch. Stop! But the train could not stop, all the brakes were out of order, the burning axles of Schnabel's car screeched horrifyingly in the night, and, in a few seconds, another burning axle rent the silence with its sharp, shrill hiss —

They yelled from one car to another, but nothing could be done: the mad train raced unrestrained down the curves and sped on screaming, screeching, creaking —

A thousand prisoners stood in the open doorways ready to jump, unwilling to die —

The train sped on capriciously and insanely, with steadily increasing velocity down the steep grades, it raced stubbornly and with set teeth into the uncertainty —

At last they reached the plains and they began to breathe more easily, although they could not stop the train even at the next station, they only yelled desperate signals to the station-master — If only they did not run into a waiting engine or a train coming from the opposite direction within the next hour they were saved —

The train came to a stop in an open field beyond a little Manchu station. They waited a few minutes, to rest their disheveled nerves, then the train went back to the deserted station.

It was wise to do so because, in a few seconds, the Vladivostok Express arrived. It would have been highly unpleasant to meet it on their way.

It was Haertl's devilish brains that enabled them to continue their journey with a good engine. He simply bought the engine of the Vladivostok Express from its engineer. He gave five pounds of American tobacco out of the reserve stores to the drunk engineer and the Russian was willing to exchange the excellent engine of the Express for the battered steam-boiler of the prisoners' train. For five pounds of tobacco. The Express stopped at the little station to take on water where the exchange took place.

CHAPTER LXV

SWEATERS, Japanese socks, American face powder and Conger's yellow American tobacco threw, dragged, and stole the train from one station to another. Frightened and excited they watched, wondering if they would be able to reach Chita, whether they would be able to go on from Chita, whether they would be able to talk sense to Vili Karendos, the dreaded Bolshevik leader, provided he was still in Chita.

Whether they would be able to steal through Semianov's empire, whether they would be able to steal across the entire Eastern Hemisphere without creating any extraordinary commotion.

As they approached the Baikal, the uncertainty and doubt grew from minute to minute. From the minute they left Manchuria, they met Red guardsmen at every station, but the guardsmen seemed to be decent fellows, who even gave them advice, and the terrifying men of whom Simi Grosz had been reading incredible stories all winter long behaved very sympathetically.

Here and there, there were Hungarians among the guardsmen and they talked to their former superiors somewhat timidly but quite respectfully. They explained their actions in but few words.

"We've joined up, Lieutenant, we've joined up, and now we are going to stick it out — "

"But why did you do it, so far away from home, in a foreign country — "

"We worked in the mines in knee-high water — we worked in the villages like lousy dogs, we starved and had no clothes — they whipped us — Now we are free — It can't be any worse — "

But there were others who spoke sarcastically to the officers, who said that neither were the officers awaited at home with laurel wreaths, that there were proletarians among the officers, too, that they, too, would want to come back here where the Red Guard fought for the Freedom of the World —

"But so far away from home — to fight in a foreign country — "

"Don't you have to fight at home, too? Is there no war at home, either? But here we fight for the freedom of the workers, here we fight for ourselves — "

One could not convince them. Anyway the command prohibited conversation with them. And there wasn't much time to explain things.

Then there were those who talked defiantly, impertinently with the officers.

"Don't you feel like putting me in chains now, Mister Lieutenant? Don't you want to force me to lick dust at the point of a gun? Go your way and let us alone — "

There were many kinds of Red guardsmen. There were some who stole to the train just when it was about to pull out, to give them a pound of sugar or a package of tea, and a letter also, which they wrote in a hurry, in pencil, a letter of a few warm, yearning words to their beloved at home, who begged them with their eyes to deliver it at home, who put their tanned, skinny fingers to their lips begging them not to say anything to the authorities, it was not necessary to repeat at home that they served in the Red Guard, in Kuenga —

It was quite difficult to understand why they wanted to fight for the Freedom of the World in Siberia. Why was it so important to settle the struggle between capital and labor in Siberia, of all places? But these were such easy questions that even the simplest of the guardsmen could answer them. The center of the World Revolution was in Russia and its front was united. No matter where the Red guardsman fought, he fought everywhere for the same aims. That was what they said. They all had the answers prepared.

It was indubitable that their revolutionary vocabulary and knowledge were larger than those of the prisoners, and therefore they soon gave up arguing with them. Soon they learned that the best thing was to let them have everything their own way. After all, they did not want to anger the Reds, they were glad that they let them go. Their aim was to go home, and not to convert the Reds.

At a station near the Baikal, a Hungarian was the military commandant of the station, Tovarishch Szilágyi. But he was in civilian clothes, and if he had not carried a revolver in his belt, the commandant would have looked like an ordinary civilian. He was a clean-shaven, bony, pale man, and very strict.

He examined the papers minutely and let the train wait for a long time. Then he ordered the train commander, Lieutenant Colonel Sivó, to appear before him. He let him wait in the anteroom. The Lieutenant Colonel waited patiently for half an hour. Then Tovarishch Szilágyi brought out a little table, put the papers on it and began to examine him. He addressed the Lieutenant Colonel as "Mr. Sivó" and when he, in turn, called him "Mr. Szilágyi" he waved it disparagingly aside and said: "Please call me Tovarishch Szilágyi, Comrade Szilágyi."

Finally he told the commander not to let his men get mixed up with any counter-revolutionary movement; as far as he was concerned he would let them go on, the papers being in order.

CHAPTER LXVI

THE dream-train was racing across Siberian steppes. The dream-train raced with drunk engineers and returning prisoners shivering with the fever of anticipation. They did not know as yet whether they were heroes or fantastics, but they went on, toward some holy dream, something far away, something that was waiting for them beyond the Buriat lands, the Bashkir fields, beyond the Chunguz homes....

At the stations they met trains crowded with Czechs, with transports of Czech legionaries. They loitered about in their green Russian uniforms. No one knew what they wanted, not even they themselves. They dared not go home now because they had surrendered the flanks, because they had surrendered to the Russians, because they had been fighting, for years, against Austria-Hungary. The peace of Brest-Litovsk had brought them nothing. The Bolsheviki informed them they were no longer needed, they might go home. They started to go eastward, without knowing why and whither, they just hoped that something would happen. They were left their uniforms and every company was left twenty rifles in order that they might defend themselves on their way. The Bolsheviki gave them trains and now they were going east, without any plans, into the unknown. They were not needed here and they could not go home because they would have to answer charges of high treason. They would have to answer for having left the flanks without protection, for having fought against their own country, they could not go home.

The prisoners who were now proudly going home looked challengingly and mockingly at the Czechs. They looked inimically at the sad Czechs in Russian uniforms who differed from the Russians only in that they wore puttees instead of boots.

They wore puttees instead of boots and they nailed little aeroplanes and windmills to the roofs of the freight cars and the propellers of the little aeroplanes and the sails of the little windmills turned when the Siberian wind blew. And there was a little clown also on the roof of one car, one of his legs was painted blue, the other one black, and he did all sorts of tricks. He turned merrily on the high bar when the wind blew.

They painted big white eagles on the sides of the cars, and the portraits of famous knights in Czech history, but no one knew what the white eagles wanted in Siberia and no one knew the knights.

The names of little villages were written on the sides of the cars in chalk, simple and heartrending names of villages, to which they could never again return —

And inscriptions too: "Hail Prague in our name, give our love to all those people and things we mournfully remember — "

There were errands the happy prisoners going home were supposed to attend to, greetings they were supposed to deliver, but they were not permitted to talk with the Czechs, they were not permitted to acknowledge the errands. They were not permitted even to look at the merry windmills of the sad boys for long: they had surrendered the flanks, they had fought with the enemy — It served them right —

The prisoners' transport went on and the Czechs with their sorrows and doubts were left behind.

They went on toward their distant aim and they passed the smaller stations without trouble. The command was reorganized, a new train commander was elected, a captain instead of the lieutenant colonel. Haertl, alas, remained with them.

CHAPTER LXVII

THE train was again racing in the Urals and they awaited, with growing hopes, the famous pillar which divides Asia from Europe. The pillar was faithfully waiting for them, and they greeted it as if it had been an old friend, as if home had been immediately beyond it. Europe was greeting them, she came to the border to welcome them. Europe welcomed her long-lost children —

In Ufa, a small city in the Urals, the Reds bothered surprisingly little with them. They did not pay any attention to them. When they reported their arrival the Reds stared at them not knowing what they wanted, what they were there for.

The Commissar did not even want to speak to them. He was busy with other things, with more important things.

And they learned that the Reds were in a tight hole. A powerful White army was standing on the Volga and bitter battles were being fought for Suzram and the Volga bridge. It was unpleasant to hear this because their route led in that direction. They wondered how they could steal through the various fronts without being noticed.

It seemed so inconceivable that now after ten thousand versts, in the last few kilometers, at the threshold of liberty, things should go amiss. It was simply incredible.

They had been accustomed to having difficulties, accustomed to fighting their way through, accustomed to arguing and to bribing, and now they did not know what to do with all the freedom that had suddenly been forced upon them. No one blocked their way, no one sent them on, no one said anything. The command therefore ordered that in view of the suspicious circumstances the train would wait in Ufa for two days.

But one Red patrol did come to inspect the train. They looked into every car, joked with the prisoners and bought from them international postal cards for a few lumps of sugar. Because this patrol was also composed of Hungarians.

They stopped when they reached the last three cars containing Haertl's provisions. They wanted them to be opened. Haertl tried to explain to them, with a saccharine smile on his lips, that the cars contained a few things only, not much, just a little provision for the tovarishch officers.

"Open them!"

First Lieutenant Haertl willingly opened them. He said:

"You will see I spoke the truth."

The Red patrol acknowedged that First Lieutenant Haertl had spoken the truth, but then the leader declared that he was not permitted to let military equipment pass through the city, he was commanded to confiscate it.

"These are clothes, tovarishch, and not military equipment. Clothes — "

The Reds explained to First Lieutenant Haertl that clothes were the most important military equipment. Then they asked him whether these provisions were intended to be used by Austro-Hungarian prisoners of war.

"Why, certainly, they are for Austro-Hungarian prisoners of war — "

"Well, and how about us? How about us, who have not received anything from home in four years? We have been waiting for these things for four years. Don't we deserve it? The ranks deserve no relief packages? Answer!"

Haertl bowed his head and silently acknowledged that the ranks were also entitled to relief packages.

"Very well," the leader of the Red patrol continued, "the ranks hereby gratefully acknowledge receipt of relief packages from home — "

And they were already issuing orders to detach the three cars and to sidetrack them to a Red siding. The Reds also lived in cars and the steel tracks of the Reds' and the Czechs' and the prisoners' trains stood peacefully side by side. These were not separated by principles and theories.

The command was crippled and deprived of its strength, it had nothing left to bribe with. The Reds took everything away. A few rebellious prisoners declared that it was good that it happened as it did for after all it was their own soldiers who got them and not the Russians.

Up to now, the command had constantly distributed money among them. This practice was stopped now. Then some of them accused the command of keeping for itself what money there was left. Because it was inconceivable, they said, that everything should have been given out.

The command, on the other hand, permitted them to go to town, to try to get loans from private citizens. The command intended to get in touch with the local Danish Consul, too; perhaps he could help them.

They scattered in all directions. Ufa, a small Tatar town, spread atop a little hill. Most of them went up there. But there were many who took their haversacks and headed for the near-by villages. They said they would try the Tatar peasants. They were said to be very kind-hearted people.

He went to the city. He entered a dairy on the main street and sat down. He waited for somebody to step up to him and say:

"Well, my dear friend, Mr. Prisoner, I see that you are in great distress, here is money for you, take it — "

He looked out through the window, through the window of a little dairy in a Tatar city. Twilight was falling and from a window across the street, candlelight beckoned to him. Candles lighted by pairs, just like the Friday evening candles in Jewish houses at home, the symbol of Sabbath, flickered unobtrusively and modestly.

He decided to go to that house.

They were not surprised at all when the wanderer entered the room. They found it quite natural that he should come to them for supper, they acted as if they had been waiting for him. They brought an extra chair to the table and a plateful of goose soup was put before him.

After supper, he wanted to bring up the question of money, but his host smiled and said that he could not discuss money matters on the Sabbath. As soon as the Sabbath was over, however, he would be at his disposal. He hoped they could reach an agreement. They made a bed for him, and placed a candle on a chair next to his bed. Perhaps he liked to read before falling to sleep. They told him he should not bother about blowing out the candle, it had to burn down of itself, on account of the Sabbath.

They put Turgeniev's "Torrents of Spring" on the chair, but in spite of his two years in Russia he could not read it. Nevertheless, he picked up the book and stared at it for a long time. He stared at the book in his hands. Here he was, in Russia, in a Tatar city called Ufa, in a soft bed, with "Torrents of Spring" in the original, here he was in Turgeniev's country. How had he gotten here anyway?

The host had two daughters who asked very warmly after his family. They promised him to help him home to his wife and child, only, they had to wait for the Sabbath to end. They told him that if it was merely a question of money he should not worry.

When evening came, the girls explained the matter to their father and the old man nodded. He told him that the girls would attend to it.

The next day, the girls took him to a Tatar village. On the way they informed him that when they came here the first thing they did was to learn the Tatar language. Now they spoke Tatar very fluently. The Tatars would give him money, for they were afraid of Bolshevism, and they wanted to have their money in undisturbed European countries.

When they reached the village, the girls called together a regular mass meeting. The younger one, Liza Monheit, stepped on a chair and delivered a speech. She told the Tatars that this honorable foreign officer was willing to take out with him several thousand rubles. She had persuaded him only with difficulty to visit this village too. An old Tatar, who wanted to send his son to Budapest to study, offered to lend him money. Liza Monheit acted as translator between him and the old Tatar and drew up a document in Tatar which she then read to them in both German and Tatar. The loan was to be repaid in Budapest. Other Tatars were also willing to lend him money, but they wanted different arrangements as regards repayment. This one here, however, was very rich, rich enough to send his son, a student of medicine, abroad to continue his studies.

All he had to do now was to learn how to sign his name in Tatar because they accepted only Tatar signatures. He added "Ben Ibrahim" to his name, to arouse more faith in himself.

His pocket was now filled with Czarist rubles and he wanted to hurry back to the train immediately, but this he could not do, for he had to have dinner with his benefactors, according to Tatar custom. He could not refuse; after all, he had to show his gratitude in some way.

At last he was in his car wondering whether to say anything about his successful adventure to his comrades at all.

Jóska Body visited him and asked him whether he knew what he was going to do. Half of the transport had already scattered, they decided to follow their noses, some of them even decided to stay in Ufa.

"What will you do?"

Body answered that he had looked up the map and had found that there was a river near Ufa, called Biela or Bielka. This was a tributary of the Volga, but it flowed into the Volga far above Samara, and there were no battles going on there. Steamboats plied on it. If he had fifty rubles, he could go by this river and avoid the front. He hoped to get home by this route. Perhaps the two of them could get hold of some money and start out together.

He answered Body that he dared not leave the fold. And then, his things might be inspected and confiscated on the boat. He did not want to part with anything. If Body thought that he could succeed, he would give him the necessary fifty rubles, but he would stay here. He would share the fate of the others. He said this only because he wanted to say something, an excuse. The fact was that he dared not go.

Body was surprised. There were dangers to be encountered by sticking together, too, and not only by individuals. And what were the things he did not want to part with?

This he did not know himself. He had a wicker basket full of all sorts of things. But really, what were they, what were the things he did not want to part with, for whose sake he would not undertake the trip with Body? One could not very well march with a package like that, it could be carried only in a train. What was in it, anyway?

It contained a checkerboard he had made in the camp, Lake Baikal and Manchu picture cards, an imitation-ivory paper cutter he had bought in a Chinese bazaar —

They went carefully through his things, to determine what could be left behind. The French vocabulary? Or the shorthand notes? Or perhaps the little diary in which he had pasted the most important news and the little pictures he had stolen out of magazines in the library? The Japanese engravings printed on tissue paper? Or perhaps the bound volume of the Amur Courier? Or the list of the most frequently used Chinese words?

The list of the Chinese words and among them: Wo-hoo-nong-dong — I have to go south.

Nor could he leave behind the Persian coins, the camp menu cards, the little Japanese fan —

He looked sadly and melancholily at his forty-pound dung heap. No, it could not be done, it was everything he had, and one could not very well leave one's riches so easily behind.

He gave Body the fifty rubles and took leave of him. He could not go, he had to save his few possessions, it was better to be with the rest —

Body tried to persuade him, but when he saw that there was no use in trying, he embraced him, and the usually impassive and cold Body had tears in his eyes when he took leave of him. He shook his hands for a long time, promised to write to his family, then leapt from the car and went straight toward the field.

"Where are your things, Jóska?"

Jóska Body waved his little reed rod: that was all he carried. He went straight to the Biela boat.

He waved back several times and it was some time before Jóska Body's slowly disappearing handkerchief was completely lost to sight. . . .

CHAPTER LXVIII

BY the time they left Ufa, half of the transport was gone. Anybody who wanted to, left, everybody could go wherever he pleased, there were no more orders of the day, everybody ate what he found. They followed their noses, but they did not know what was ahead of them. No trains were on the tracks leading to Samara. No one wanted to get to Samara and this was strange. But more and more trains were coming from that direction and it seemed to them that the passengers in those trains looked at them with pity and sympathy.

At the Samara station, the station-master did not salute the train.

In the gathering twilight, the ragged soldiers who lay all about the station in piles looked like gently breathing sacks of potatoes.

The beams of the station were sticking out, the building had no roof.

In the restaurant and in the waiting rooms sick refugees loitered hopelessly about or gazed at the ceiling in despair.

Children howled and women more dead than alive cried from fatigue.

A mother, tired to death, hearing her child bawl, tried to get to her feet, searched about mechanically among her parcels for a few seconds, then dropped prostrate to the ground and fell asleep.

Near the tracks, among the sick, the wounded, the refugees, the beggars and the scrubby Volga boatmen, a few fires burned under kettles.

Messy mush boiled in the battered iron pots, the fires were fed with dirt gathered from the streets where it stood in heaps.

Deserters, ragged streetwalkers, filthy vagabonds, the scum of the city. Red-shirted peasants, princes in disguise, aristocrats running away from the Revolution.

They drank tea, they sang, they dug graves for children with kitchen knives; they played the accordion; they slept, they cried.

They beat up thieves, they invoked death, they kissed and embraced and celebrated nuptials under tattered blankets, they dressed wounds and scratched lice and the foul smell of human misery hung about them.

At last one who seemed to be a soldier advised them to turn back.

A few kilometers from the station, a desperate struggle was being waged for the possession of the Volga-bridge. It made no difference who won, their lives would not be safe in either case. At best they would have to dig trenches, but it was highly possible that, to save food, they would be mowed down by machine guns.

They fled backwards, back to Asia, back beyond the pillar of redemption! They did not even look at it when they passed by. Back to Asia, back to the country of the Buriats, the Bashkirs, the Chunguzes, away from bloody Europe. Perhaps Asia would save them for civilization, for family, for culture!

They stole back to Asia, haunted and hunted, full of fear, of anxiety, of horror. Back, back, farther and farther, as far as possible, far away from the machine-guns of principles, from the bayonet charges of theories, from the drum-fire of doctrines, back to Siberia!

In a large Siberian town they got stuck. They were not permitted to go on. They could not go on running away from the world, they were forbidden to carry any further their mortal and filthy little lives, the train was taken away from them, they had to get off.

They had to get off, with the wicker basket, with the list of the most necessary Chinese words, with the proud: Wo-hoo-nong-dong, I have to go south —

They were herded into a big prison camp again.

Into a prison camp whose barbed-wire fences offered protection, they entered deeply moved, heaving sighs of relief.

To rest! To rest! To sleep! To sleep! Not to hear the rattle of the train, not to see the Samara station, not to stare at distant goals! To rest, after these five weeks, to stretch out, and perhaps — perhaps, to wash! To bathe!

Beautiful, pleasant, accustomed, comfortable, peace-giving prison camp! Protecting fences! With watchful guards on their posts, with dear wooden barracks, beautifully sunk in the ground, into the earth which surrounded them caressingly, benevolently, soothingly, smoothly. Sunk into immovable, patient, motionless, eternal and indifferent earth. . . .

The next dawn, they were waked up by the rattle of machine guns.

Shells whizzed above their heads and machine guns barked back at the cannons.

Half-mad men, with insanity in their eyes, raced up and down among the barracks, tearing the uniforms off their bodies, begging for mercy, falling to their knees, then dashing on again, throwing away tunics and rifles, collapsing unconsciously. Bloody men and soldiers with cheeks shot through hove into sight, then disappeared again, leaving a trail of blood behind them —

It was the St. Bartholomew's Day of the Red Army.

The Czech legions were permitted by the Soviets to go home and they were sent off to Vladivostok by trainloads. Every day a few trains were sent off so that, by the end of June, by the time the first train arrived in Vladivostok, the last transport was just leaving the Urals. Every battalion of the Czech legions carried a few rifles by permission, to ward off possible attacks by marauders in Siberia. The situation on that day was that, from the Urals to Vladivostok, across the whole of Siberia, there was a Czech transport at every station, with disciplined and fairly well armed soldiers.

There were hatred and fire in their eyes, and desperate recklessness. Where were they going, anyway? Home? — They, who had been fighting against their own country?

To go home, to surrender at discretion, to capitulate, to lick dust? It wasn't sure at all whether they would be forgiven at all, there was war at home yet and there was no hope of mercy.

But there was at least one Czech battalion at every Siberian station —

It was then that General Gajda sent his fatal command screaming through the Siberian telegraph wires.

They would rise that night and seize all the stations of Siberia's only railroad line. They would take the command of their destiny in their own hands. The Czarist Admiral Koltchak would organize the army of the White counter-revolutionaries, and, together with him, they would continue to fight in Siberia for the Great Czech State. They would then have a right proudly to refer to their struggles against the Red Menace, and when the Great Bargaining came, they would throw their Siberian sacrifices into the pan of the scale. They fought in distant Siberia for Europe's culture and civilization! This would be their slogan on Judgment Day, before Europe's Areopagus.

That night, the Czech Legions rose at every Siberian station and attacked the Red Guard. In one single night, they seized control of the Trans-Siberian Railway, the Guard could nowhere resist for more than a day or two.

Some of the guardsmen, former soldiers of the armies of the Central Powers, fled back to the prison camps, where their superiors rewarded them, for their short days of glory, with revolver bullets.

Those were the days of retributions, of decimations, of bullets. But after the gore and massacre of the first days, the remaining Red guardsmen were once more locked up behind the barbed-wire fences of prison camps, they had once more become prisoners of war.

The jails of the city were crowded, the dead were buried. And they did not have to be mixed up in the struggles, they could watch everything from afar, indifferently and nonchalantly, as if it meant nothing to them at all!

In this city, the Reds, driven by the Czechs, instinctively retreated to their former abode, the prison camp, and defended themselves from behind its fences. That was why bullets flew in the camp and shells whistled above their heads.

There were some who threw away their uniforms and rifles in time, who then shivered in borrowed rags in some corner until the battle was over and the search for renegades commenced.

Many of them were not recognized, and these ex-Red guardsmen later took up patching shoes again, went back to the cobblers' shops, where they had been when the storm of Revolution had carried them away.

Then there were some who committed suicide, some who fell, some who were thrown in jail, some who were pardoned because they were cooks and because they were ready to cook for the counter-revolutionaries too.

But what was all this compared to the fact that the prisoners of war could once more rest peacefully, that once more safe locks were guarding their peaceful cots, that once more, in the watch towers of the camp, there glistened comforting, protecting, and selfish bayonets!

Merciless searches were conducted. For hidden revolutionary pamphlets, for escaped revolutionaries, for secret arsenals, for concealed ammunition, for fugitive Red guardsmen among the prisoners.

But the searches came to an end, too, and the retributions also, the battle cries were forgotten, the counter-revolutionary front of Gajda's and Koltchak's armies was permanently established in the Urals and the victors solemnly informed them that the captive officers might once more sew on their insignia, that the captive officers and ranks would once more receive everything due to prisoners of war, that the officers would again receive their pay. And once more they settled down to wait for peace.

The Governor of Siberia, Admiral Koltchak, issued new banknotes and their monthly pay was given to them in these notes. They were given a hundred rubles a month, twice as much as under the Romanovs.

But Koltchak's hundred rubles were not enough to buy even bread, and the old Czarist rubles were not trusted either.

And one morning the prisoners of war awoke to find that the seven years of plenty were over, that the pipes which had hitherto poured milk and honey upon them were clogged, that the invisible power who had taken care of them had vanished, that worries for the daily bread had descended upon them.

The thousands and thousands of them in the huge camp suddenly realized their hopeless impotency, their desperate situation.

Something had to be done, the frames of their old principles, the forms of their old ideas, had to be broken.

They were facing starvation.

Their money was worth less and less day after day, and famine was their master. It was no longer a question of petty comforts and pineapple preserves —

CHAPTER LXIX

THE new camp was situated on a knoll near the city of Krasnoyarsk, on the river Yenisei. It was much larger than their old camp had been on the Amur and Ussuri and there were many thousands of captive officers in it. They also had a Lavka, they also had officers' meetings, theater, and laundry, philharmonic orchestra and Welfare Committee. Up to now, they had lived just as all the prisoners had lived in all the Siberian camps; amidst anticipations, expectations, petty quarrels, nervous arguments, Messiah-waiting, and broken hopes.

But now that cruel want lifted its head, they were beginning to send their souvenirs, their carefully saved preserves and chocolate rations down to the city. They examined their linen and decided that two shirts were enough for the time being. One shirt, therefore, was superfluous, it could be sold. Small caravans were going down to the city, carrying the officers' belongings to the junk shops. Agents were hired to watch for an officer pulling out his watch. The moment he did so, they pounced down upon him: "How much do you want for your watch?"

"I won't part with it. This is the one thing I want to keep — "

"All right, all right. I don't want you to give it to me right away, but if, God forbid, you need some money, I'm always willing to buy it. Or, if you want me to, I'll take it down to the city and sell it for you. I get five per cent. from the sale price. Barracks No. 5, the second box to the right. Just ask for Lieutenant Schulteiss — "

More and more packages, larger and larger parcels were sent down to the city, the go-betweens made more and more money out of their percentage and out of the difference that always existed between the real sale price and the one they confessed to their clients. Yet, in spite of all this, most of them held themselves aloof from becoming agents, although even colonels and generals gave commissions to them and entrusted them with errands. They silently acknowledged the fact that this first lieutenant or that captain was professionally engaged in placing goods in the junk shops of Krasnoyarsk and they soon got accustomed to it.

There were first lieutenants who, in the years gone by, had been living under the protectorate of the command and had therefore been in a position to save. They had saved everything they could lay their hands on, every time there had been a distribution of socks, or clothes, they had managed to get something for themselves. Then there had been light-hearted brigadier generals, and even one major general, who had never thought of the future, who had asked only for so much as was needed at the moment. Thus it happened that a prudent lieutenant or a cautious first lieutenant was much richer now than the uncalculating brigadier generals. For in these days of poverty, the wisely saved clothes, tobacco, conserves, nail clippers, shaving soaps, overcoats and Chinese quilts had become things of enormous value.

There had been poor actors, living for applause only, who had preferred their art to material advantages, and there had been supers, and, especially, "chorus girls," who had saved the little presents spendthrift Mæcenases had showered upon them. Now these little things assured them not only of a carefree life for several months, but also enabled them to lend to reliable persons — of course, only against security — a few rubles. Naturally, they charged interest too, and they never forgot to remind the borrower that, in case the loan was not repaid in time, the ancient seal ring would be lost.

The Tyrolese kettle-drummer had slowly wheedled everything out of his poor captain and now that the captain had become completely impoverished, the kettle-drummer left him and indignantly refused to pay heed to the captain's yearning glances. The kettle-drummer bought flour in the city and then, going into partnership with a baker's assistant, baked rolls and made an excellent living out of this enterprise. He sold the Chinese quilt and the fine underwear he had received from the captain, took his saved rubles out of the little bag hanging around his neck, and he had the capital for his undertaking.

The agents said that the prisoners were very inefficient. After all, they could bring leather from the city and it wouldn't be so very difficult to make shoes out of it. There certainly were cobblers among the ranks who could teach the officers how to make shoes. They could start on slippers and sandals, it would give them an excellent living. Thousands and thousands of things were needed, and all of them could easily be made by the prisoners. From tin pans to children's toys, everything, everything was in great demand. Nothing could be imported, either from the east or from the west; the various fronts had completely cut off the city. Even buttons could be manufactured.

One evening he heard a timid, modest knock on his door and an awkward, smiling, young man in Russian clothes entered.

The awkward little youth told him that he had been an assistant county clerk in Ugocsa County and was very much surprised because he could not remember him. Can't you really remember me? I was county clerk in your home town. Einstein said that you were here, that's why I have come up right away, to see whether you need anything. Don't you really need anything? If you do I am ready to —

Of course he did. A little money always came handy. But what's your name? I can't seem to recollect it. Although I do remember you — Your face is very familiar to me — what's your name again?

"Jampel. Don't you remember Jampel?"

"Of course, Jampel — Why, certainly! — Well, how are you, my dear Jampel?"

"Fairly well, thank God — And if you need a little money — "

Jampel told him that he was now working in lumber. His father had been the owner of a lumber yard, that was how he knew something about it. Now the Russians had entrusted him with the management of a yard. That was what he wanted to see him about. He remembered that he had a woods at home —

"A woods? I? You mean, I have a woods?"

"Yes. I know it. I used to be a county clerk in your town. I can even tell you where it is. At the foot of Mount Pálna. That's the place where the woods is. And when I go home I'd like to settle in that town. I think I'm going to get married soon. I am engaged to the daughter of the Krasnoyarsk cantor. And I'd like to build a little house for myself. Of course, only when I got home. I'd like to buy some lumber from you. Not much, just enough for a little house. I'll pay for it right now — Will you do it?"

"Why, I think I will — Why not? But why don't you buy the entire woods?"

"It's too expensive for a poor man like myself. The beautiful oaks there, though — I'd like to have some of them — "

They struck the bargain and Jampel happily paid for the oaks, for the oaks he would cut at the foot of Mount Pálna, the oaks for his little house....

CHAPTER LXX

THERE were no more officers' meetings and no more orders of the day. The affairs of honor had lost their importance. To be sure, there were no new so-called affairs of honor in the camp. They had other things to do now than to defend their honor and to demand satisfaction for insults. For all those who neither had reserve funds, nor were able to find acquaintances among the privates, all those who had never saved, who had never occupied a position, who had never been connected with a theater, in one word, those who had no bread to eat now, were forced to look after something. They could reduce their needs to a certain point only, it was impossible to renounce everything. And the pay was not enough even for dry bread.

It was no longer surprising to hear at night:

"Wake me up to-morrow at six, I've got to go to work—"

The bakery needed men. At one end of the camp, a man was baking earthenware pots, he needed help, too. In one of the barracks, some of them started to make sandals, and the example was soon followed by many. Those who had sewed costumes for the theater, now patched and repaired linen and clothes. And there were some who proudly stated that they had been apprenticed to cobblers, that they would learn the trade in two months.

They discovered that there was a demand for cigarettes. So they bought tobacco and paper and manufactured cigarettes. The tobacco was prepared by the Turkish officers. They transformed the tasteless, raw Siberian leaves into fine, mellow Turkish tobacco. The Turkish barracks were the center of the traffic in tobacco; they manufactured the finest cigarettes.

Small shops were established. The two rows of rooms in the barracks were walled with lumber and thus there was an aisle created between the rooms, both on the ground and on the second floor. The officers whose beds were next to the frame partition had been complaining all these years that they could not sleep because of the constant shuffling of feet in the aisles. They were mostly subalterns, who slept near the partition. Now they suddenly stopped complaining. They cut a little window in the wall and wrote above it that cigarettes, matches, salt, thread, or dried fish were on sale there. Thus the shops came into being. They attached sliding panes to the openings in the walls and when a buyer appeared, he knocked on the window, the shopkeeper pushed the pane aside and handed out the desired article. Commerce was flourishing: there was one shop to every ten prisoners. Wax candles were sold in Barrack No. 5, preserves in No. 6, and in the Turkish barrack Effendi Murad sold halvah. There even was a stamp store.

At one end of the rooms a new world throbbed, but at the other end, the prisoners were still reading the classics, studying equations. They would not surrender.

Least of all would the German officers. They simply did not want to acknowledge that the world had changed. They still wore monocles in their eyes, orderlies were carrying after them their canvas-backed chairs, their afternoon tea was served in a carefully tended flower bed that stretched before their barrack, and they acknowledged the humble salutes of their allies with the waving of canes. They still adhered to strict discipline, and no one could understand how they could live like that. True, the Germans had never lived wastefully, they had always been better organized and had always limited their rations to the minimum. But only when they were among themselves. As soon as they were mixed up with the others, the Hungarians and the Austrians, they demanded more than the rest of them. They too borrowed but they put everything in a common treasury, they said they would organize a big factory where only orderlies and privates would work so that they could continue to live like officers.

The Germans' tenacious adherence to fashionable life even in this misery depressed them greatly. For, among the Hungarians, things had gone from bad to worse, even Lieutenant Colonel Koncz had become a cobbler and he was very glad when he had enough work. The Germans' dogs, on the other hand, were still led by orderlies three paces behind their masters. But there was something that evoked unanimous admiration for them. One day, an unexpected search was held in the camp. This time, however, they were not looking for secret pamphlets, or for arms, not even for conspirators. It was announced that if the presses on which forged banknotes were being printed were not turned in, or if the forgers would not voluntarily give themselves up, the entire camp would be decimated, the barrack where the presses were hidden would be annihilated, and all its inhabitants shot.

No one had ever heard of such goings on and the search was unsuccessful. But in a few days they learned why the search had been held.

The Russians did find some presses operated by German officers in the camp at Kansk. Nor did these officers work, they also lived according to their old standards. They lived in a superciliously gentlemanly fashion, far above the sweating industry of their colleagues. And then the Czechs and the Russians discovered that the Germans were forging banknotes.

Everybody was amazed at German industry, German knowledge. How beautifully they imitated Koltchak's notes! They were not forced either to work or to borrow money from privates! And, perhaps, they would not have been shot at all had they behaved less challengingly at their trial. For they demanded to know by what right Koltchak was issuing banknotes in the Czar's country? Or, if they acknowledged the Bolsheviki, by what right did they print banknotes without Moscow's permission?

The presiding judge of the court-martial, so it was said, answered that they printed money by the right of rebellion, but if a rebel was caught he was shot. Consequently, the Germans were also treated as rebels and were promptly shot.

After the execution of the Kansk Germans, the life the local Germans led seemed even more mysterious. This forged-banknote business only enhanced their dignity. And although they lived modestly they continued to exist without work, and they drank their sugarless tea from Japanese cups, sitting at carefully laid tables covered with spotlessly white cloth. The Kansk Germans were pitied and, at the same time, admired for their courage. And when they met Germans they told them they were smart.

Until now it was the agents who brought news of the world to the camp. Now they wanted a profit even on this. Several of them hit upon the idea of publishing a newspaper. But the proposition met with lively protests. The idea was dropped, but not because of the protests. It was dropped because the agents found it difficult to transact deals without the help of talk. They had to tell news, they had to talk, perhaps they could get the cigarettes for less, perhaps they could wheedle out a larger percentage. They brought news every day. They picked it up from the soldiers passing through the city.

It was they who told that, at home, the real fights had only just begun. That the Russo-Czech Armies fought successfully against the Bolsheviki and if they could only break through the Red front in the Urals, the camp would soon go home. But there was no sense in going home now, there was still war at home.

So much for internal politics. As for foreign news, all they knew was that America had also joined the war, but it seemed to them as if they had heard this already. Or had it merely been planned? They could not remember.

Then they heard that poor Almoslino, the postmaster, together with Heedbloom and even with Conger, had been hung by the Reds in Khabarovsk. The Hungarian privates who had joined the Red Guards had discovered that the consuls' warehouses had still been full of food and clothes. Enraged they had arrested them and had demanded to know why all these things had not been distributed? Why they had let them starve and freeze? For whom had they been collecting all this? Why had they not distributed the relief packages sent from home? Apparently, they had not given satisfactory answers, neither Heedbloom nor Conger, and since poor Almoslino had happened to be with them, all three had been hung in a freight car. Both Conger and Heedbloom had protested on the ground of extraterritorial rights and international agreements, but the Reds had said: To hell with them.

Much more news arrived, of firing squads, of hangings, of executions, the whole world was burning, but the thing that most interested them was the billposter.

There had been, for years, a billposter in the center of the camp. A barometer and a thermometer were attached to it, and there was a clock on it too, but all these were of little importance. Until now, only books for exchange were advertised on the poster, or goods for sale. But now there were other notices on it.

"We need strong men to tan rawhides. Lengyel & Horvát, Barrack No. 16."

"I need box makers with lathes. Pharmacist Cipris."

"Aspirant Gervey wants position as man-of-all-work. Does everything orderlies would. Would take on three or, at the most, four busy comrades. Willing to patch clothes and darn stockings."

"Urményi teaches French, German, Swedish. Success guaranteed. Berlitz Method. Grammar taught."

"After lunch, drink your coffee at Sümegi's. Nut and poppy-seed cakes. Always fresh. If requested by all the guests, Russian melodies sung, with guitar accompaniment."

"Don't throw away dry crusts or any other refuse! We pay high prices for them! United Hog Growers."

"Who is willing to give a saw and a rasp-file for a six-hundred-page Chinese A B C, Hungarian-Russian dictionary and logarithm table? Report at nine p. m. in Barrack No. 5, one flight up, Box 23, to the right. Bringer."

"Don't waste your time and energy! Become a dressmaker's apprentice! I teach you how to sew quickly! Small tuition fee. Barrack No. 6, ground floor, Box No. 2. Lengyel."

CHAPTER LXXI

FIRST LIEUTENANT REISS one day stopped in front of Aspirant Zsigmond's little contraption. It was indeed an interesting sight. For Aspirant Zsigmond — a postmaster at home and Magician Dantsek's most adept pupil — discovered that, in this industrial age, the tools were soon blunted. Therefore, he built a contraption; a large, circular grindstone was its feature and one could push it from shop to shop and sharpen the blunt tools on the spot. But he could stop in a quiet corner too, and he often did so, because he was tired of pushing it around and would have liked to settle down and expand the grinder into a tool repair shop. Thus earned his daily bread Aspirant Zsigmond, Postmaster of Torda.

He was now standing with his machine in an excellent place, beneath a staircase. It was a well protected and quiet corner and he could work there unmolested.

But First Lieutenant Reiss was not staring at the little machine. He was curious to find out from whom Aspirant Zsigmond had rented the place. He too would like to lease a place like this, he was interested to know whether one could rent a place like this at all and if so, for how long a term. He had stopped as if he had merely wanted to sharpen his knife, but all the time he was asking questions of the grinder. Aspirant Zsigmond was called Uncle Zsiga these days, because that name was more becoming to a grinder. Uncle Zsiga ran his nail over the edge of the knife and told First Lieutenant Reiss that he had leased the premises from the camp command for ten rubles a month —

Those around them pricked up their ears. What was that, was the camp command still in existence? What did it matter to anybody to whom a little corner below the staircase of Barrack No. 17 was leased?

A few hours later, First Lieutenant Reiss leased a garret from the camp command and two days later, the more reliable inmates received the following little notes:

"Madame Jenny will be pleased to have you for tea at five o'clock in the afternoon."

Driven by curiosity, they went to see what Madame Jenny wanted of them at five in the afternoon. Madame Jenny was First Lieutenant Reiss, and he discreetly informed them that the camp had acquired an extraordinary and most desirable institution. The garret of Barrack No. 17 had been fixed up comfortably and there were two real women there. One could have the women come to his own room, but then, of course, it would be more expensive. Furthermore, the women would go only to such rooms as were occupied by no more than ten prisoners. One of them was a very charming Buriat woman; she did not speak even Russian well, and her favorite expression was "Rennenkampf," which was the name of a famous Russian general. Ha-ha-ha!

First Lieutenant Reiss assured the prisoners that the camp command realized the importance of such a sanitary institution and that, for the time being, he was granted a monopoly. Because of the many diseases rampant in the camp it was not deemed advisable to let this industry spread without limitations. The institution was under constant medical supervision, no one need be afraid.

First Lieutenant Reiss soon expanded his establishment, but even then it was always filled. His customers were chiefly recruited from among the entrepreneurs, the capitalists, from among those who managed to borrow from somebody, or who sold a piece of jewelry; the temporary capitalists. Day laborers, simple workers could not afford it. Soon, however, several similar establishments followed Reiss' example, although these dispensed with the services of a physician and paid less rent. These did it secretly, they were proportionately cheaper. But it was not wholly impossible that Reiss had lied about the command's consent, for the secret establishments were not molested either.

The workers suddenly let themselves in for gratifying their hitherto suppressed passions. Some spent all their money on rum and liqueurs, others bought raisin wine, but the entrepreneurs took great care of their money and spent cautiously. There were many workers who, of a Saturday evening, either spent their entire weekly income on Miss Rennenkampf, or wasted it on drink, or gambled it away. But the entrepreneurs never risked their entire capital. They sipped warily of the entertainments offered, always looking after the interests of their businesses and keeping an eye on expenses. There was the cornet, for instance, who manufactured underwear. He went up to Reiss', stayed up there for two days and two nights, drank and played cards with the girls, then came down with the news that he would enlarge his shop because First Lieutenant Reiss' employees were now his customers and they had placed large orders with him.

One day there appeared an advertisement on the poster calling for strong workers in unlimited numbers. The entrepreneur, Philip Razzen, needed lumberjacks. The advertisement also said that the workers had to bring their own tools, saws or axes. But Lieutenant Razzen was not very particular regarding the axes. He was willing to get them for the workers. The cost would be deducted from the salary. It seemed like steady work, but it required very strong men. They reported for work in scores, but the foreman never refused anybody. Everybody was needed. Indeed it was such excellent business that Razzen had several foremen already on the third day.

They were cut off both from European Russia and from the East. The city ran out of everything and there were more and more orders arriving in the camp day after day. Because of the war and the various revolutions, help was scarce in the city and it often happened that Russian artisans gave the entire equipment of their shops to the prisoners. There were hog growers in the camp and there was an establishment for smoking beef, they manufactured salami and sausages and made the Russians acquainted with genuine Hungarian paprika bacon.

Both ordinary and fine toilette soaps were manufactured, there was also a book-bindery and a toy factory. There were carpenters, and a cabinet-maker, too, for a professor at the Budapest Royal Academy of Arts and Crafts had now settled down as a furniture maker.

Cipris' Perfumery manufactured not only perfumes and Eau de Cologne, but also face powders and toothpaste. Cipris gave his recipe for shoe polish to Aspirant Steiner, who immediately established a factory and turned out thousands of boxes of brown and black shoe polish. There were tanneries too, and the leather goods manufacturers made not only saddle and other horse furniture, but also brief-cases, ladies' hand-bags and footballs.

The prisoners grew rich quickly, and those who had decided to go to work soon enough were already foremen in big plants when their impoverished comrades could not get jobs even as extra help, so overcrowded were the factories.

CHAPTER LXXII

THE Wadko had become one of the most powerful organizations in the camp. It stood for: Waren-Abteilung der Kriegs-gefangenen Offiziere. It was the prisoners' great organization to buy, distribute and market products. The little shops on the aisles did not ruin its business, on the contrary, they relieved it from bothering about small purchases. The Wadko was left over from the old days and, in reality, it was maintained by the command. This, however, did not mean that the command used it for its own selfish purposes. On the contrary. The existence of the Wadko was based on the sympathy and coöperation of the prisoners. The prisoners were customers now and they had to be satisfied, they had to be flattered. They had to be lured to the Wadko, consequently, it was in the financial interests of the command to gain the confidence of the prisoners and to have them support the Wadko.

The Wadko offered honest competition to the underground shops, the dishonest organizations. It carried only first-class articles and introduced "clearing," which meant in the camp that one could pay in a certain sum and as long as there was something left on the credit side, one could purchase anything one pleased. Thus the Wadko was always in a position to buy at reduced rates, because it always had considerable sums at its disposal.

The Wadko's checks were accepted as real currency, they were accepted in the city too, even the Russians respected them.

For there was a shortage in currencies. Therefore, some of the organizations issued notes of their own. These were accepted as legal tender in the camp, but once a prisoner wanted to play a joke on a city merchant and paid him with one of these notes. The Russian accepted it, gave goods for it, he even gave back the change in real money.

A smart fellow established a pawnshop. But it dealt only for a few weeks in clothes and jewelry. One Saturday, one of the manufacturers had no money to pay his employees. He went over to the pawnshop, took his finished goods with him and struck a bargain with the pawnbroker. From that moment on, the camp's first pawnshop dropped its original policy and settled down to industrial banking. Operators in a tight hole, and those who could not readily sell their wares, took their articles to the pawnshop by carloads. The broker organized a big warehouse and worked only in quantity. But soon dozens of usurers and scores of small pawnshops were established to satisfy the demand for them.

The value of the money was constantly sinking. A Produce and Exchange Bank was therefore established in Barrack No. 17. Those who deposited their capital in the Bank could protect themselves against the fluctuation of the Russian currency. The Produce and Exchange Bank bought immediately real currency: yen, dollar, pound sterling, or gold. All loans and interest were paid and had to be repaid in yen, dollar, pound sterling or gold. The Bank's checks and certificates soon commanded a premium in the city. The Russians considered the certificates of the Produce and Exchange Bank as the most reliable investment and for a certificate worth one thousand rubles they paid two and even three thousand Koltchak or Czarist rubles.

In the shadow of the great industrials, big capitalists and big operators, there appeared little individual businesses also. A captain sold nut candy, which he made himself, at night, Sunday morning, on the promenade, lieutenants sold lemonade, cigarettes, matches, pencils and notebooks, and, at night, pastry makers went from room to room offering their wares. Some of them carried trays which were suspended from their necks, and they offered, with persuasive smiles, shoestrings, shoe polish, soap, buttons, or they let you know in whispers that the game in the Casino Iritz would start to-night at six o'clock —

But they had to whisper this for a short while only. Soon the gambling houses operated quite openly. They did not need to hide, no one persecuted them. There was a day when three new roulette dens were opened at once. All they had to do was to lease a room from an impoverished prisoner-family. They put a large table in the center of the room and although there were no roulette wheels, one could lose or win just as easily with numbers pulled out of a bag. While the game was going on in the room, the original inhabitants withdrew to the walls and sat around silently as if they had not been in their own homes at all. Of course, they got a slice from the profits of the house, but most of the time they were paid only a flat sum for the rent, and for the hospitality.

Saturday evening, when the workers were paid, the shops were suddenly flooded, the casinos, the restaurants crowded, the workers charged the pastry venders, emptied all the little trays hanging from the necks, they bought up all the cakes, they bought up everything.

Mr. Reiss' various establishments were swarming with patrons, and the rooms with agents and procurers. These latter distributed handbills informing the prisoners that another charming little nest had just been opened, a very pleasant little nest, and it was not expensive at all.

The theater also reopened and huge posters advertised "The Count of Luxembourg," but, of course, by Saturday and Sunday, when the performances were scheduled to take place, tickets were already commanding premiums. The ticket speculators waited all week for this opportunity and they profited quite nicely, provided any one was so foolish as to wait until Saturday to buy his ticket.

Barrack No. 18 underwent extensive alterations and opened again as the first cabaret. For the time being, they played Schnitzler on the stage, but one could eat and drink during the performance. Patrons who did not drink were neglected, but those who ran up big checks were entertained by the ingénue who, here, too, was substituted by a good-looking youth, because girls were still not permitted to parade openly. Indeed, even if they had been, where would they have found Hungarian and German actresses? Remained, therefore, the male ingénue, who, since he played in a cabaret, had to drink with the patrons. He had to drink, to entertain them, to help run up their bills. And in order to make the sausage manufacturer feel absolutely at home, chambres séparées were established in Barrack No. 18, booths nicely curtained, and when Lieutenant Köves' gypsy band went in at the invitation of the prodigal patron, the head-waiter discreetly pulled together the curtains.

In front of the cabaret, crowds of poor prisoners gathered, poor men who had not even enough money for a demi-tasse and hence could not enjoy even for a fleeting quarter of an hour the crumbs of pleasures their rich comrades so prodigally gobbled up. The head-waiter was constantly bawling out the cornet and aspirant waiters because they were not carefully watching the dodgers trying to beat their checks, especially that Turkish bimbashi, who yesterday again succeeded in getting away with two cheese cakes, one demi-tasse and three liqueurs.

With tattered pieces of underwear under their arms, broken, haggard, miserable officers visited the junk shops at the end of the camp. They tried to sell their shirts. After long bargaining and begging they were given for them a quarter of a pound of sausage made of horse-meat, or, perhaps, a small loaf of bread. It was difficult to explain to them that their linen was of no value whatsoever to anybody except themselves, it could not be sold as anything but dishwashing rags or machinery wipers —

On the first severe winter morning, a shocking sensation stirred the laborers hurrying to work. A sleigh dashed in through the gate and went straight to Barrack No. 5. There it stopped. The sleigh was laden with straw, but this alone would not have aroused any suspicion. In a moment or two, however, a body wrapped in sacks was carried out of the barrack and put on the sleigh. The man wrapped in the sacks was unconscious and one could not see his face. But it was obvious that he was a human being. As he was carried to the sleigh drops of blood fell on the snow through the sacks.

The sleigh raced away with the man, escorted by a medical student.

Shuddering and whispering, they passed the name of a first lieutenant all around the camp. He had been out of work for weeks and had repeatedly appealed to the command for aid. The last time he had asked for help, he was refused. He was unable to borrow anything, and since he had already sold all his belongings, he loitered about the camp in ragged clothes, completely shot to pieces. He had met another jobless lost sheep, a demoralized and worthless Turkish aspirant, and together they decided to rob the Devecseri Leather Goods Warehouse, in the garret of the Turkish barrack.

They committed the robbery that dawn, but they did not know that the warehouse was guarded. The guard dared not openly resist the two robbers, he managed to get in back of them, and in the darkness, hit at the first lieutenant's arm with his ax —

It was this first lieutenant who was now taken to the hospital in sacks — He was covered so that his comrades should not recognize him.

It was obvious that something had to be done about this, to prevent the recurrence of such a thing. Therefore, the Camp Constabulary was organized that very day. If the would-be criminals knew that there was a Constabulary they would not attempt such outrages.

Now that the Constabulary had been established, several prisoners spoke of adventures which lately had befallen them. An aspirant from Barrack No. 6 was robbed of his weekly salary in the dark aisles; a captain, as he went out for water, was attacked by two unknown thieves who pulled off his overcoat; an agent was robbed of his gold watch and of his silver-fox fur cap with the foot-long earlaps. From an aspirant, apprenticed to a cobbler, a pair of boots were stolen; he was delivering them when they were torn out of his hands. It wasn't even dark, yet he could not see who took them.

Until now, no one dared speak about these things. Men considered them so incredible. They simply could not imagine how they could have happened. Now everybody was talking of nothing but them. Until now, men had suffered their losses in silence rather than to mention them, but now they realized they had been mistaken because the Constabulary immediately created order. Guards were placed before the warehouses, street traffic was prohibited after a certain hour, and whoever walked abroad at night, did so at his own risk. There were also patrols around the cafés, the cabarets and the theater.

Thereafter only petty thefts occurred, but such things, of course, happened even in the most civilized and most orderly states.

The Constabulary was a success, the robbers and bandits disappeared, they must have gone straight because there were no more complaints.

The police soon enlarged their activities. They began to control the cabarets and the underground taverns, persecuted the card sharps, and decided to wipe out immoral goings-on. The camp was not surprised at all that they did all this.

At first the camp disapproved of and was against the measures taken by the newly created department of the Constabulary, especially the cafés tried to stir up sentiment against it, but a mistake the police committed one morning made them very popular. For early one morning, they arrested little Aspirant Kilényi because he had been kissing Lieutenant Ruttkai in back of a barrack.

When taken before the command they proved, however, that they had been drinking in the cabaret all night long, that they had got drunk and, since nowhere in the world, not even at home, was it criminal for two drunk men to kiss each other after a night of drinking, they requested to be discharged.

The command was annoyed because of the blunder the police had committed and immediately discharged the two of them. They went all over the camp and indignantly related the injustice committed against their personal liberty. It was curious, nevertheless it was true, that it was just this blunder which made the policemen detailed to the new Department of Public Morals popular and, from that moment on, the camp was not so much annoyed as amused by the members of this worthy institution.

Of course, there were many who charged the Constabulary with misconduct. They said that, for a few rubles, its members shut their eyes to malpractices that went on in the cabarets, that they did not report the gambling dens if only the bribes were sufficiently tempting, that, for a few rubles, they let a great many things go on unnoticed and were especially indifferent as to the regulations concerning public morals.

But all these were merely false charges. Naturally they did accept a few rubles they did receive here and there, especially from the gambling houses, regular graft, but since the law was very hazy, it was most of the time up to the individual policeman what to consider a crime. There was no written law, they went, on the whole, by the laws at home, but, of course, by only as many as they could remember, and no one could be possibly forced to remember more than what he wanted to.

Sometimes the police were accused of forgetting, for good money, all the paragraphs.

And if a few burglaries had occurred lately, it was because the Constabulary could not very well attend to everything. It was simply overwhelmed with work. To counterbalance this, the larger plants and firms organized a police of their own, a private police, to guard the stores and the warehouses.

The theater revived "The Divorcée." The house was crowded and the performance superb. First Lieutenant Magda, the prima donna, sang the rôle beautifully, and Gaby Tóth, the soubrette, danced ravishingly with Ernö Gábor, who was a well-known actor at home. Some of them remarked that the soubrette's voice was getting a little too husky, but his ankles were still the same. Laci Dobos was simply conquering in the leading male rôle, he was a brilliant bon vivant. He would certainly get a good contract at home. In the last act, there was a special song. When this was sung — it was said to be a Siberian addition to the operetta — the entire audience cried:

Out there, thousands of mad cannons boom,
In here, lyres sing and gentle flowers bloom —
Soon I'll see my child again, and wife,
When Peace at last will end all blood and strife....

Mr. Ortmann, proprietor of the salami factory, wept, the entire directorate of the sandal works wept; the battle-scarred veterans in the boxes wept; the president of the Court of Appeal wept, the director of the Wadko wept; the foreman of the guts-cleaners wept. In the middle rows cried the alcohol smugglers; a little farther back, the Nemalah's plumbers and mirror builders and the croupier from the Casino Iritz, still farther back, the off waiters from the Theatrical Buffet, and way back in the last rows, the shoestring vendors, the dishwashers, the peddlers, the cigarette-fillers, the fifty-five-year-old cobbler apprentices, the lumberjacks, Uncle Gyula, the sixty-year-old captain in the Reserve, who could no longer work and lived by selling an infallible system to win at cards. The entire Officers' Corps cried, the cruelest capitalists and the most inhuman profiteers were shedding bitter tears —

Even on their way home, they were still under the influence of the performance. It was late, and on the road from the theater to the barracks, policemen shivered in the frost-bitten Siberian night. Near the fence, where the potato-bed had been in the summer, a thin cloud of smoke rose from the snow. It looked very suspicious and a few of them called a policeman and went over to see what it was.

As they approached the fence they saw that there was a dugout underneath the snow, the smoke came from there. They were about to turn back. Perhaps it was a small workshop only, or perhaps a new café. But the policeman said that he knew of none in that neighborhood.

It was a wretched dugout. Its door was covered with straw to keep out the cold. One couldn't open it, but after repeated yells and shouts an old, bearded man, wrapped in a Chinese quilt, came out. Even after he opened his mouth, it required a considerable degree of imagination to recognize in him First Lieutenant Korzer. He was angry at having been disturbed, but, since they had discovered him already, he was willing to tell them that he built the dugout himself, because he did not want to go among men any more. If a dugout had been good enough for them on the front, it was good enough now, too. He would rather live there than return to society, which he had learned to hate and to despise.

There were rags and splinters of wood in the cave. The rags were Uncle Korzer's clothes, and the splinters served as fuel. He must have stolen them from the fence. There was an old pot in the den, half filled with water, his messtin, containing some morsels of food, was on a primitive fireplace, near the wall, on the floor, covered with some straw, there were two planks, that was Uncle Korzer's bed. One could not stand up in the dugout to which Uncle Korzer withdrew to live like a cave man.

The policeman wanted to take First Lieutenant Korzer to the command. But the nocturnal visitors still under the influence of the song in the last act of "The Divorcée," would not let him.

They asked Uncle Korzer why he had given up worldly pleasures and the society of human beings.

Then Uncle Korzer collapsed onto the two planks and burst into tears. He said he could not bear it any longer, he retired to the den to die. At home, he had been an accountant, but he could not do any manual work. Not because he was unable to, physically he was in good condition, he was only forty-three years old, but he could not bear it mentally.

He considered manual labor humiliating and he considered himself humiliated whenever doing any kind of physical labor. He had often attempted it, but he always had to give it up. He knew he would perish there. His clothes were in rags. The hundred rubles were barely enough for bread, for the past two weeks, ever since he had retired to his cave, he had been living on bread only. During the day he never left his dugout, except when going for his pay. He left the cave only at night, and then only to fetch water. He would never be able to do any physical work, but he would consider any kind of mental work as redemption. He wanted to do something. But if he again had to lathe or cut tin plates with scissors, he would die —

All of them had gone through this. During the first days, they felt humiliated when they picked up a hammer. It was in their blood. And even in this misery, they could not completely get rid of it. There were many willing to do even the heaviest of labor if only it was done somewhere where no one could see them. No matter how badly it paid, a bakery always had enough help. But if some one advertised for loading freight among the barracks, in full view of the others, there were no applicants, no matter how high pay was offered. A business man took pity on Uncle Korzer. A big business man, who had a costly iron lathe, twenty employees and who sent considerable sums home through the Czech legionaries' mail. He told Korzer to report for work the next morning. He could keep books, a large plant like his needed a bookkeeper anyway.

Uncle Korzer was overwhelmed with joy. Immediately he rose and left the dugout. He did not want to go back to the barracks that evening though, because he was too full of lice. He decided to sleep in a barrack for the ranks. The next morning, then, he would go down to the bath, would disinfect and delouse himself and report for work.

The business man was roundly cheered by the grateful group of prisoners and soon the news of his blessed heart spread in the camp. Everybody was glad that Uncle Korzer's life was saved. They made way for him and the business man, in his expensive fur coat, with a fat cigar in his mouth, started home with a friendly wave of his hand.

He started home for, so he said, his orderly was waiting for him with supper and he did not want to have him stay up all night long.

The big business man had a private kitchen and a private orderly. He did not eat of the mess-mush, his stomach was ailing. He walked in a dignified manner toward his private kitchen, his private orderly, his private supper and, with the consciousness of a good deed well done on his radiant face, he hummed in the Siberian night:

Out there, thousands of mad cannons boom,
In here, lyres sing and gentle flowers bloom —

They scattered, they all went home, but he could not forget Uncle Korzer's bent figure as he was carrying his lousy little bag toward the barracks for the ranks.

He reached his room. The lamp was burning, although his room-mates were not home. He knew that all of them were out working overtime. Richard was out, he had to help out at the dressmakers', they had to finish a trousseau in a hurry. It was said that the trousseau was intended as a surprise, an axle-grease manufacturer had ordered it as a present for the daughter of a Russian military commander.

Little Sluka was also out. He had been taken away in the afternoon by the Czechs because he hailed from Rózsahegy, and since the Czechs claimed that that city would belong to the future Czech State, he was drafted. Steve Rácz was out substituting for a croupier in some gambling house and the others were also out.

Who, then, was in the room? He opened the door cautiously. He had a guest. Little Tánczos.

Little Tánczos first begged his pardon for disturbing him at such a late hour. Then he told him that he was in a terrible predicament. He begged him to take with him some letters and give them to his parents and sisters. For he would never again see the Chain Bridge, the Hill of Roses, St. Margit's Island, the Eastern Terminal —

He was pale and trembling with fever, the little Tánczos who had joined the Army voluntarily at seventeen and had fought bravely. He had not been eighteen when the Russians had taken him prisoner, wounded. He was a diligent, brave boy. He always worked hard. He was like a young bear: a little awkward but strong. He was a charming lad. His heart was soft as butter, and now he threw himself on the bed, crying bitterly:

"I'll have to die, Doc — I've got no revolver so I'll have to hang myself — Couldn't you get a revolver for me? It would be better than — "

"Have you gone mad? What's the matter?"

The boy told him of his tragedy. He was the most reliable among his box-mates, so he was entrusted with the care of their hard-earned rubles. One Saturday evening, on his way home from work, he was lured into a gambling house. At first, he lost his own money only. Then some one who knew Uncle Gyula's system, sold him the secret at a reduced rate. Following the infallible system he lost all of his room-mates' money, all the laboriously saved rubles.

For a few weeks, he kept the matter a secret. He took on extra work, worked day and night, hardly sleeping at all. He couldn't have slept anyway because his conscience was bothering him. He sold everything he had so that, when one of his friends asked him for money, he could give him some. To-night, however, he could not. He lied that he had taken it to the Bank, he had not wanted to carry so much money on his person. Now he would have to die before to-morrow morning, before the Bank opened.

It was barely a thousand rubles for which little Tánczos wanted to die, a voluntary soldier — a voluntary death.

He called him down. He gave him a slip of paper, a receipt for the missing amount. He told him to go home and not to worry, he would get the money by the morning. He warned him not to do anything rash before he saw him again. He would get him a loan, to be paid back after the return.

"By morning? By morning, Doc?"

"Yes, by morning. And now go home. No, don't go. Wait for me here. If your room-mates are looking for you, show them the receipt and tell them you are waiting for me. Tell them I have gone out to fetch the money."

He commanded little Tánczos to sit quietly and not dare do anything. Nothing would come of it —

He went out in the buran-ridden night and pulled the proprietor of the gambling house, where the boy had lost his money, out of his bed.

It was an easy matter, because the gamblers' consciences were never quite clear. They never knew what surprise would overtake them. Czech soldiers were wont to drop in on the gambling houses, and every time they came, the proprietors actually shivered at the thought of what would happen if a Czech should lose.

The gambler came readily and asked him what he wanted.

He told him what it was all about. It would end in a scandal. He demanded the money back at once —

The gambler whined. He said he did not even know the young man. Was he sure that he had played in his casino? The whole thing was nothing but a scheme of his competitors, because lately he had been successful. The boy must have played in the Turkish barrack, in the roulette room. Why, in his place they wouldn't even sell chips to such a young man! It would be best to go over to the Turkish barrack, too. Oh, perhaps, all the owners could get together and could chip in on the missing sum. That would be best —

He was adamant. He said he needed it at once. The full amount and at once. Otherwise: there would be a scandal. He would go and seek redress. He would go to the command, or even to the Czechs, and he would go at once —

The gambler now accused him of trying to blackmail him.

He grabbed the gambler by the neck.

He was going to take him to the command at once.

It was a damned shame!

If any one was willing to gamble, willing to win, he should be willing to lose too! Every casino in the world pays back the lost amount under such circumstances —

He began to yell and to shout.

This was the most efficient way to deal with him. The gambler begged him not to speak so loudly. Only, no scandal! The whole camp might be aroused. Then he took out his money bag and counted out the sum in hundred-ruble notes. He shot a painful glance at him after every note. Wasn't it enough already?

But when the money was paid out, the gambler shook hands with him and told him that he was very grateful for the intervention. Good that it did not end in scandal. God forbid! You see, such things can easily be fixed up between gentlemen. Of course, not everybody would do it. The others have no idea of ethics and honor.

He took the money to Tánczos. The boy heaved a sigh of relief.

He asked the boy never to gamble again. The boy promised. One could see in his eyes that he was going to keep his promise.

By the time he went to bed it was morning. The aisles were already stirring. Here and there, early customers knocked on the little windows and asked for ten cigarettes. A servant was carrying water. He could hear the splashing of the water. Before he fell asleep, he heard a comrade going to work hum sadly:

Out there, thousands of mad cannons boom,
In here, lyres sing and gentle flowers bloom —

CHAPTER LXXIII

WHAT was it that enabled the gaunt and sharp-eyed First Lieutenant Dima to continue, ragged and starving, his series of lectures on "Oriental Gods"? What caused Hans Kohn to paint the future of Palestine in such brilliant colors in Barrack No. 19? What caused Gyurka Szász, a bespectacled aspirant, to tackle the English language after he had learned the French?

There were only a few such ascetics left. Need and want swept the men away from the books, away to the bench, the three-legged cobblers' stools, the guts-scraping knives, the lathes, the plumbing shops, the powder mills, the smuggling. Only here and there could one perceive, among the sweating and hard-laboring men, a Dima, a Hans Kohn, or a Gyurka Szász.

The Prague university professor had also sunk low. He was a professor of history at home too, and not only here. Many of them had become university professors in Siberia. The command had appointed them a year or so before. For there had come instructions from home that courses for university students should be established. Law, philosophy, and all sorts of other courses.

The lecturer had been selected from among those who had doctors' degrees in these particular subjects. The instructions, so they had said, had informed the students that the credits received for courses taken in the camp would be accepted at home.

He remembered his old camp, where the command had appointed him to lecture on economics. He had been a university professor in Siberia for three months.

Those were the glorious days of culture! Every day he mounted the rostrum to lecture to his pupils.

But he spoke to his pupils alone for only two days. After his second lecture, Captain Würth visited him in his box and asked him whether it was true that his course would include Socialism too. He confessed that his course included all the scientific theories concerning economics and therefore Socialism.

The next day, half the camp came to his class, the lecture room was not large enough to hold them, they went over to the theater, even that was crowded. He had to hold parallel courses, and yet they shouted at the end of every lecture: "Continue, continue!" At the end of class, he was applauded just like the more popular professors at the Budapest University. The real pupils had no place to take notes, there was no chance of questioning. After a while, the real students did not come to class any longer, they were crowded out by the dilettantes, and they were satisfied if he merely testified that they had regularly attended class —

The glorious days of culture and science were gone, there was no university here. There was want here and those who had money were lost in worldly pleasures. No one was interested in Saint-Simon or in Robert Owen's co-operative society, in Fichte's Geschlossener Handelstaat, in Marx and Lassalle.

He was no longer annoyed by Captain Würth's naïve questions, was no longer irritated by the scholar Jaczkovics's sharp looks and disdainful smile with which he used to accompany his lectures from the end of the third row —

Captain Würth was now carrying water for a private kitchen and Jaczkovics, the scholar, bowed deeply every time a customer entered his book-bindery. The Prague professor, on the other hand, the only real university professor among them, who denied that he was a professor and denied that he was from Prague, was still very busy. He had regular hours in his box, from three to six in the afternoon, his box-mates, for a small fee let him do it. He was at home from three to six to the tattered wretches as well as to the profiteers. He sat, with a tall, pointed, fantastic, blue hat on his head, in a black tent from whose ceiling hung mysterious crescents and balls. Here sat the Prague university professor from three to six, and read futures —

The ranks no longer lent money to the officers. Even those who had been in jobs were distressed now. Competition was keen, the officers were ready to and did accept jobs as cab drivers even, or if the Czech command would let them, as farm-hands in the villages. The more affluent of the ranks said that they had enough money out, they would be happy if they could get it all back. They no longer trusted those who were willing to borrow, and, anyway, they thought that their money was in a better place when invested. The speculators and entrepreneurs not only made the entire camp their employees, but even drained the channels from which possible loans might flow. They laid their hands on every ruble that was not employed. If any one had a little more money, he was taken in as a partner, was given a share of the profits. They promised interest, to be paid not at home but here, in Siberia. Men with money wouldn't even talk to a poor prisoner. Loans to be repaid at home had become themes from naïve fairy tales, no one dared bring them up any more. He would have been laughed at.

CHAPTER LXXIV

THE prisoners used to call the camp gorodok. This Russian word means "small town." Indeed it had been a military town in the Czar's day. Russian Regiments had lived in the barracks before the prisoners. One part of it was still inhabited by troops, by Admiral Koltchak's soldiers and Czech Legionaries. But most of it was used by the prisoners. The officers lived in brick buildings, the ranks in barracks dug in the earth and covered by frame-roofs. Lately, a few eccentric officers had gone to live with the ranks. Some of them wanted to learn a trade and, since their teachers were living there, they moved down too. Then there were some who took an oath of asceticism and, indeed, they had plenty of opportunities to practice virtue and self-denial in the ranks' barracks. There was First Lieutenant Barth, for instance, who professed to be a disciple of the Encyclopedists, but who spread the theories of the philosophers of the French Revolution with some changes.

Thus, for instance, he said that, according to Diderot, every man was born to sin. He maintained this viewpoint, but he also said that while one man is impoverished by his sins, another may be enriched by them. First Lieutenant Barth preached purification, he advised his comrades to expurgate themselves of impoverishing sin as well as of enriching sin. He did not, however, define just how to do all this.

Dr. Forgács also lived down there; he was a lawyer who had gotten mixed up with the Reds in '18. He had later been sentenced to death, and was now temporarily at liberty. But if the Red Revolution should again break out in Siberia, his sentence would be executed. He could not escape for, if caught, he would be shot. And if there were another Bolshevik revolution, he would be shot, too.

There was a rumor in the camp that those who maintained relations with him were watched and, therefore, not one of the officers spoke to him, their brother-officer. The ranks, of course, were different. They treated him with great respect and although they lived very closely they managed to make place for a table where he could work. Forgács called his box, Death House. He used to say that every day he lived was a present, because there was no chance for him to escape and he considered it impossible that there should not be another revolution in Siberia.

He once went to visit Forgács, who received him rather coldly. He told him that he should spend as little time with him as possible, because the story about his being watched was not wholly unfounded. Said Dr. Forgács: "One shouldn't be a sentimentalist when one's life is at stake. The ranks, of course — well, that's a different question — "

He gently fondled the ranks with his glance, the ranks who gave him of what they had the least: room. Because the ranks lived in the semi-subterranean barracks so closely that when they lay down, with their little box under their heads, on two rows of shelves, they were right next to each other. A night down there was agony: stinking human bodies, foul smells, coughing, snoring, the smoke of bad tobacco. You could not move, you could not stretch out your arms, you could not get off the shelf any other way than by creeping cautiously forward between two neighbors. You could lie only rigidly, and if there was a filthy man next to you you had to get filthy, and if he was full of vermin you had to get infested with vermin, and if he was lousy you had to get lousy too. From day to day, from week to week, from month to month, from year to year. How long yet —

But they managed to get even closer and, next to the stove, before the window, near the door, they gave room to the officer sentenced to death.

They gave him room where all the bitterness and all the sufferings of a lifetime were condensed into every minute of every hour, where they waited for years for one to die who lived near the door, for one to drop off who slept on the lower shelf, for one to fall dead whose place was near the window. What did the man who sat in a good warm café, near the window, and protected by a bronze windbreak, know of this? What did he know of what it meant to live at the other end of the room from the stove in fifty-five degrees of cold below zero, to live on the upper shelf with rheumatic legs that would not carry one up there, to live far away from the window whence light came. What did he, who had never yet been nearly choked to death by the agonizing air of a Siberian barrack for the ranks, know of this?

It is incredible how few words there are in the dictionaries, how poor one's vocabulary is when it comes to describing the swollen feet, the lost teeth, the stinking rags, the wound-eaten bodies, the vermin, the hopelessness. All one can do is to acknowledge defeat, for there are no words, anyway. There is no sense in trying to do it unless one can stuff a little of this smell into Humanity's nostrils, unless one can hurl a piece of these rags into Humanity's face, unless one can hold high one of these swollen legs, unless one can exhibit these diseased eyes, unless one can make every human being in the world feel the pains of a prisoner of war whose misfortune it was to be among the ranks.

The chorus of disabled soldiers at noon howled because what they were given as soup was merely hot water with three ears of oats swimming around in it. A comrade entrepreneur had taken over the feeding of the ranks and it seemed to be an excellent business.

Privates whom Siberian farmers had kicked out for the winter to save bread, privates whose feet were burned off by molten iron in factories, privates whose legs or hands were frozen off cutting Siberian forests, privates whose hair had fallen out from sorrow, whose bodies had rotted away in typhus, whose lungs were perforated by the Siberian wind, who had picked up scurvy on the Murman Coast, whose teeth had fallen out, whose gums had blackened, these privates had come to the camp to live in these barracks. They had come to wait for death. And in this regard they did not differ from Dr. Forgács who had also gone to live there while he waited for death.

But among the privates, there was just such a ladder, from beggars up to Salami Manufacturer Ortmann, as among the officers: from the millionaire Aspirant Hanák down to Lieutenant Colonel Koncz, the cobbler's helper —

The war-profiteer private had long since forgotten the barrack from which he had started. Mr. Ortmann, who, some time ago, had dashed out like a madman when soup had arrived to get a ladleful with some fat in it, now paraded in a Siberian silver-fox cap, and at the New Year's Eve orgy in the Theatrical Buffet, was host to the entire personnel of the theater. French champagne flowed in streams, and both the philharmonic orchestra and Lieutenant Köves' gypsy band played for him. All the tattered inmates of the barrack whence he hailed could have eaten fresh white bread for five years on the money he spent on that one night. People used to say: "He makes good money, he can do with his money what he pleases — " Mr. Hercz, the jeweler, had discovered a new industry. And the prosperous, well-to-do officers at last knew how to save their riches. For some weeks past, Mr. Hercz had been manufacturing, in very great secret, shoe-soles and shoe-heels of gold. The thriving officers covered these soles with leather and thus they intended to take home their honest, well-earned pennies.

But Dr. Forgács was unwilling to talk about these things.

"And are you so certain that you will be executed?"

"Well, why shouldn't they execute me? Take it the other way. Suppose that I am not the old Red Forgács, but a major general at home. Don't you think that I will execute the rebels I capture? Suppose that I am a White commander in Koltchak's army. Won't I shoot the rebels? Suppose I am commanding a free Red unit somewhere in Siberia. Won't I kill every one of our enemies? Resign yourself to the thought, this is how it has to be. But it doesn't interest me — It is incredible that you don't want to realize that history is being made all around us. Tell me, when has a revolution ever been merciful? Tell me, when has a counter-revolution ever been merciful? And what is this barrack, if not an execution ground? What the Murman railroad, what the scurvy, what the starvation, what the three logs of wood daily? Aren't these death too? You had better go back and not bother either me or yourself —"

Dejected, he left Dr. Forgács, who, so he thought, was exaggerating a bit. He was on his way back to his barrack, but first he went over to the Nemalah. He thought he might as well take on a job, his money was dwindling, he had to earn a few rubles. But his old job in the Nemalah, smearing amalgam on glass plates for mirrors, which he had light-heartedly thrown up, was already taken. They offered him a job in the plumbing shop. They gave him a big piece of tin plate and a pair of shears and told him to cut a figure out of the plate. He did it well, they hired him at once. He was to cut circles out of tin plates with shears, six hours a day. Hard labor, but well paid. He took the job.

Until now he had always been able to get by, he hadn't had to work. Only once had he been forced to build mirrors for a few weeks, but he didn't like at all this circle-cutting business. But he was ashamed to borrow from his brother-officers. Although they asked him for a receipt, they all acted as if they had given him alms. They smiled when he said: "I'll give it back to you at home." They smiled and said, with a supercilious wave of the hand:

"That's all right, that's all right — "

Nor were there any more loans from the ranks. Nothing remained but the plumbing shop. Too sad. To cut tin circles in a drafty shop, to cut until one's arms and legs got rheumatic, well — He would be invalided for a few weeks, too, he was sure he would cut his fingers — There wasn't much solidarity among men —

For the last time, he stretched out on his cot, a free man. Then the bespectacled Gyurka Szász came into his room. He was a silent, gentle-mannered youth, this Gyurka Szász, he was always studying.

"What is it, Gyurka?"

"If you don't mind, Doc — I noticed that you didn't eat all of your bread yesterday — I noticed that you have left some of it for some days now — But only — of course — only if you really don't need it — "

"Sure, my boy — I don't need it — Take whatever there is on the shelf — "

"All of it? All that there is on the shelf?"

"Surely. I eat only bread from the bakeries. I'll give you some of that, too — And I'll try to get a loan for you — "

"I'll be very grateful to you, Doc — "

"Tell me, Gyurka, what are you doing at home? I mean what's your father at home — What's his business?"

Gyurka Szász's eyes suddenly filled with tears. He answered in a very low tone:

"President of the Chamber of Deputies — Or perhaps, of the House of Lords — I really don't know for sure — "

He leapt to his feet. He looked at the frail, serious, refined Gyurka Szász. At the boy who was always studying. And who begged a piece of bread now. A piece of bread that would have become moldy anyway —

"What do you mean — Chamber of Deputies — or House of Lords — "

"Károly Szász — My father is Károly Szász — President — "

Gyurka turned away and looked out of the window. He looked toward the infinite, heart-breaking, snow-covered Siberian steppe. Tears were slowly dripping from his eyes.

He laid his hand on the boy's shoulder, wanted to say something, something consoling. Then he sighed in silence:

"You know — there isn't much solidarity among men — "

"Yes? Did you say something?"

"I only said I'd try it — I think I'll be able to get a loan for you — "

"It would be very — very good — "

CHAPTER LXXV

HE worked, as a plumber, for six weeks, in the Nemalah's shop. He worked in a very underheated room. At first, he was merely drawing circles on tin plates, with an iron-pointed compass. Then he was entrusted with cutting out the circles, too. Soon he was promoted again. The tin plates had to be turned up along the edges and hammered into the shape of mess-tins. He worked in heavy overcoat, fur cap and a pair of trousers made out of Chinese quilts, but his left hand was constantly frozen. Occasionally, he hit his fingers with the hammer, and then his hand began to bleed. His hand was black and full of pus and blood, his left hand, which held the tin plate. He would then caress and fondle his left hand, and stop being jealous of Szamek. He knew it had to be thus. His left leg and left hand were suffering. His left leg was turned toward the door and the cold stole in through the door, it painted painful stripes on his thigh, but his right leg was well taken care of, nothing bothered his right leg. That was right next to the fire where they heated the soldering irons. That would not get rheumatism. He could even pull a glove on his right hand, his right hand could afford that luxury. His left hand, the poor one, had to work, had to suffer the hammer beats. Aspirant Szamek was detailed by Fate to the office, to the warm office, where the clerks were drinking nice, hot tea all day long, and were talking about Palestine. The clerks enthusiastically praised collectivism, they said this was what the Utopians were dreaming of: intellectuals and manual laborers working together in perfect harmony. Just as here in the Nemalah. Of course, not everybody could be working at the anvil, some one had to do mental work, too. To confer with customers and clients, to take the responsibility. One might say, that was even harder work.

The feeling of shame under which he labored during the first few days, whenever he had picked up the hammer, slowly disappeared. But he had grown irritable, cross and bitter, and the moment the foreman sounded the gong, he threw away the hammer and dashed out of the shop as if chased. He had grown suspicious of the directors, he suspected them of not dividing the profits punctually and correctly. He spoke of the directorate in an ironical and disparaging manner. He was boiling over when he saw how they spent in the Theatrical Buffet, how they spent more than the laborers earned. He smelled a rat somewhere and told his observations to the other workers, who also became excited.

In six weeks he left them. He got into a quarrel with them on a pay day, he charged them with being far worse than the other manufacturers. Those at least did not expect their workers to be interested in their theories with which the workers had nothing in common anyway, they did not demand hypocrisy, demanded nothing but work. They did not try to get hold of their workers' souls —

"We don't demand it either — "

"I know — I know — But you like it. Whoever is interested in your ideas you call a good man and raise his wages."

"Well, we have the right to do that, haven't we?"

"Yes, but you call yourselves different. Why don't you confess that this is just another capitalistic undertaking?"

He did not go back. To himself he confessed that it was not the Directorate he disliked, although he had his own opinion of them, but the work. He hated to work.

He decided that he would once more try to live on loans. He figured that he would scrape together five hundred rubles a month and that would be enough. Rather be a swindler than work.

It was much easier than he expected. He did not even have to simulate misery. He merely informed a few of the big capitalists, quite confidentially, that the son of the President of the House of Lords was starving. He knew the family from home. It would be a superb investment to lend to the President's son, such an act would be very favorably thought of at home. With his last rubles he bought fine cigarettes, he offered them to the capitalists and spoke, in an offhand manner, of his estates at home. He casually informed them that he had found an excellent overseer for his estates. He got in touch with agents and told them that there were still men in the camp to whom a loan would be an investment.

A private helped him in his bluffing campaign. Infantryman Eugene Sályi, who came from his county, and who had often heard his name before the war, testified that he was rich.

In a few days, he received several very good offers. Jampel, to whom he had sold the forest, indignantly asked him why he turned to others when he knew that he was always at his disposal. Eugene Sályi brought in men of money, who gave him gladly, too, although they would have given still more gladly to Gyurka Szász, who, however, borrowed only modestly. He said he did not want to burden his family.

Sályi said that he was glad to bring him moneyed men, but he would like to buy some tools for himself, too. He asked him to vouch for him. It was a ridiculously low sum that Sályi wanted to borrow.

"Why don't you borrow more? I'll vouch for you — "

"God forbid! I have a young wife and a family at home, I don't want to take on too much of a burden — My little land can't stand so much mortgage — "

Now that he was in a better position he had more time to look around the camp. He had time to sit in the cafés, to make endless conversations with the jobless, to wait for the spring which was soon to come again to the Siberian steppes.

CHAPTER LXXVI

SPRING had come.

It began just like all the other days. Floury bakers' helpers delivered fresh rolls, a cavalry first lieutenant hurried for tea-water. An honorary judge of the Hungarian Supreme Court and a lawyer picked up their axes. Uncle Korzer sharpened his pencil, Captain Görög hung the tray with the potato-pancakes around his neck. Szamek lighted a cigar and went over to the Nemalah, Reiss' was just closing and the drunken patrons were kicked out. The camp was awakening.

Shots were heard. Machine guns began to rattle and whistling, whizzing bullets lodged here and there in the walls of the barracks. A shell screeched above the camp.

Captain Görög put down his tray, Szamek looked around interestedly, Uncle Korzer murmured something in his mustache.

Creeping cautiously and looking for protection, the prisoners of war tried to find out what it was all about. They had not the slightest idea of what could have happened.

Cossack squadrons raced through the camp and lashed the prisoners into the barracks with their cats-o'-nine-tails. But even at the risk of their lives, the prisoners soon emerged again.

The din grew louder. The bullets flew thicker and thicker. A sight-seer, bloody and lifeless, dropped from the roof of a subterranean barrack. Another sensation-seeker was shot in the leg, he was also stretched out. When the Cossacks saw that it was dangerous to be curious, they left the prisoners to their fate and whirled out of the camp.

The prisoners climbed on the roofs, on the fences. The rooms on the upper floors were crowded. Four men were atop the water-tower. They were everywhere, wherever they could see something. They darted hither and thither excitedly. They shouted:

"There are two dead Russian officers before the Lavka!"

"The rebels killed them! The 30th Siberian Regiment mutinied!"

"The mutineers are already in skirmish line!"

"They are surrounded from the direction of the salami factory!"

"The Czechs are already coming from the summer camp! With four field guns!"

Red agitators had visited the recruits of the 30th Siberian Regiment the night before. They had incited them to revolt and, at dawn, they had killed several of their officers. They had dug themselves in beyond the prisoners' camp. The loyal Russian troops, together with the Czechs, kept them under fire. They were shooting at them with machine guns, shells, field guns, shrapnel, whatever was handy. The camp too was showered with projectiles. Interesting, whenever such things happened it always took place in the camp. In '18, too, when —

. . . The machine guns rattle faster, the shells cut huge holes in the field, the shrapnel mow down the young recruits —

At eight o'clock sharp, silence.

A priest, in full vestments, approaches the mutineers. He is holding high a white flag. Behind him, two civilians are carrying a church banner. The young Siberian recruits — one can see them very well — take off their caps. They jump out of their dugouts. They surround the priest and kiss his hands. They have surrendered to the priest.

They stack arms and assemble unarmed. Apparently, they have been promised clemency, otherwise they would not have stacked arms. Now they assemble in column formation and, singing merrily, stepping rhythmically, they start to march toward those to whom, but a few minutes before, they were sending death.

There are about two thousand of them. As they reach their enemy of a few minutes ago, the priest suddenly runs away from them, and away dart the two civilians carrying the banner. Armed Cossacks surround the disarmed rebels.

Whips fly and crash on their faces, swords swing and slash their cheeks. They crack open rebel skulls, they rip open rebel bellies, they cut open rebel eyes.

The green fields shriek a shriek of disappointment from surprised Siberian boys. Rebel throats are slit open, blood and marrow drip from the swords.

The banners, yes, they were genuine church banners. But the priest was a shrewd sergeant-major with a false beard, and the two banner-carriers were two captains.

Two thousand ambushed, trapped young boys are lashed into cafés transformed into jails. The revengers undress them. They chain the bloody-eyed lads. He who resists is no longer alive. The bark of revolvers and the swish of swords trickle out through the closed windows.

The swords swing all day long and all night long. The whips have gone mad.

Men are thrown into the ditch beyond the fence. Men with popped-out eyes, men with ears lopped off, men without hands and feet, men with severed throats, men with chopped faces. Saplings of men who, yesterday, were Siberian soldiers.

But there are no burials as yet. More deaths are to come yet. There will be more of them yet.

The heap of corpses is not high enough yet.

The court-martial is busy already.

The events take place outside of the camp, but the camp is only a few steps away, the prisoners can see everything. Let them see everything! They may learn something! Let them look! Let them see how the rebels are taken to the field! By pairs! By threes! By fours!

It is easy to see who is sentenced to death. He wears white underwear. And he is shot down from behind after a few paces.

But they have to watch out when they shoot, because the field swarms with wheelbarrows, picking corpses. They have to watch out, they may kill innocent men.

The ditch is full.

A pit ought to be dug, there are so many more of them yet.

Rifles crack in the field, white underwears collapse. There, one of them makes a gesture, he lifts his arms as if —

A sword flies out of its scabbard, the rebel skull is cut into two, the arm is severed, it drops in the green grass.

The howls go on all day long and all night long and the rattle of the guns, too, soon it will be noon again, and the pile of corpses is still rising.

It is afternoon, soon it will be evening, and yet it does not cease. You feel as if the bullets were splashing your brains, as if they were knocking on your skull. As if they were piercing your ears. You must listen to them. You must listen to them even if you hold your ears, you must see them even if you shut your eyes. Twilight has come and yet it goes on. How long yet?

It is late at night. The rifles still clatter.

There is no sleep to-night. There has been no sleep for two nights. There is no sleep abroad. Only vengeance.

On the morning of the third day, the rattle ceases. The pile is taken away. They tidy the field. They pick up whatever lies here and there in the dust.

Screaming mujiks, swooning, shrieking mothers arrive from the neighboring villages.

They, too, are lashed. There are no graves dug as yet. They will have plenty of time to collapse on the mass-grave when it is ready. We aren't that far as yet.

The mujiks have come running bareheaded, and the women have brought no bread and geese as they always do. But, on the other hand, their soldier boys do not embrace them now.

Terrifying news flies through the camp. The President of the Turul Society has been summoned to appear before the court-martial. Pélyi, author of the pamphlet entitled, "Twenty Million Hungarians," has been summoned. And Székely, too, the vice-president, and Dr. Száva, too, the secretary, and Fekete and Katona from among the members. Dr. Forgács has been summoned, too. They have come for Dukesz, too. And Kálmán Ludvig, the editor, also has to go.

Near the subterranean barracks, a rebel officer is hiding in a ditch. He has been trembling and shivering in that ditch for two days. He sees a patrol approaching. The end!

A shot. The rebel has committed suicide.

The patrol pulls his corpse out of the ditch. A rebel officer! But he wears a gray coat. An Austro-Hungarian coat! Who gave it to him?

So? There is no answer? Really?

Neighboring barracks, fall in!

Decimation follows — One — two — ten — one — two — ten — Forward, march —

No, it's no good! The barrack commander must be among them. Who is the barrack commander?

"The commander was not home last night — "

"Second in command?"

"Infantryman Eugene Sályi — "

"Infantryman Sályi forward — No, it's no good. One man is superfluous. One man should go back. Can't you hear it? One man fall back into line — "

But the legs are rooted in the ground, the soon-to-be-murdered eyes can only stare —

"Can't you decide it? Well — You go back — "

A few steps, then a volley, the doomed men collapse, among them Eugene Sályi, temporary barrack commander, who preferred starving to taking on any more burden, who did not want to mortgage his little land, his little house at Kökönyesd —

In the meantime, Captains Krasilnikov and Mógyorossy find Dr. István Száva guilty of organizing the Turul Society, which included criminal aspirations in its program, also Dr. Géza Pélyi, Lajos Székely, Lieutenant Emil Fekete and Dr. Gyula Katona. Dr. István Száva is permitted to give the pictures of his wife and his small son, before which he has been praying these past five years, also, his engagement ring, to a brother officer for safe-keeping.

The others have no last wishes. The Turul Society, and the Hungarian Society, by planting the seed of unjustified aspirations, have spread the spirit of rebellion in the camp. Dezsö Forgács was found guilty two years ago and his suspended sentence will now be executed. Aspirant Arthur Dukesz, Cornet Kálmán Ludvig, Infantrymen János Papp, George Pável, Aspirants Albert Gáspár, Alajos Molnár, Dezsö Krassovsky, Béla Skoff have published a Communistic paper and therefore it is to be supposed that they have been connected with the rebellion. The punishment: Firing squad. To be executed at once.

Six o'clock in the afternoon and the procession is slowly marching to the graves already dug. Dr. Forgács is marching at the head, smoking a cigarette. Pélyi and Dukesz are busy. They are supporting Ludvig.

Two wholly antagonistic viewpoints support Ludvig who thus perhaps will be able to drag himself to the execution ground.

Krassovsky waves his hand to the camp. He knows that, from behind the closed windows, thousands of imprisoned eyes are watching them.

At the curve, they disappear.

A volley —

Sluka, the former room-mate, stands guard before the window.

"Hello, Sluka — "

"Don't stick out your head, Doc, our command is to shoot — No one is permitted to look out — "

"Don't be silly, Sluka — "

Little Sluka lifts the gun to his shoulder and fires —

It is the command. . . .

CHAPTER LXXVII

THE first snowflakes were whirling in the air and the horrors slowly receded from the prisoners' hearts. The face-powder mill went on working and the cafés extended credit only till Saturday. Babustyák was the most popular character actress, in the roulette room of Barrack No.

7 twenty rubles was the lowest bid, and a new, more moderate magazine took the place of the Yenisei. A button manufacturer reorganized his plant and manufactured winter shoes, the Czech legionaries placed large orders for linen intended for Russian girls, although they sometimes complained that it would be good to go home.

The executions of the summer were deeply deplored. It was said that Miss Elza Bandström, of the Swedish Red Cross, had interfered, and it was she who had been responsible for the end of the butchery. One could talk quite calmly with the Czechs, they analyzed the events quite sensibly. Why, they had also been inmates of the camp and not even so very long ago, either, but they had been drafted and had had to go. Now they lived outside of the camp, in their own barracks, or in trains. Occasionally, they still came in to draft. They held raids, for everybody who lived on Czechoslovak territory was required to serve.

But otherwise, there wasn't much difference. They told them that a delegation from home had visited them, it had brought decorations for their Siberian deeds, and promotions. So the promotions and decorations were quite serious after all. The prisoners should have twice thought over that the Turul Society, and the Hungarian Society, and the Yenisei had also been serious, just as starvation was also serious, and prosperity, too. If one had money he could buy serious food with it.

There were already many dissatisfied men among the Czechs, they said they had bled enough for the interest of the Allied Powers, had sacrificed enough. Home, home! They, too, wanted to go home.

Sometimes they became quite careless and betrayed to their old comrades, their former fellow-prisoners, that there was trouble coming. Discipline in the Koltchak armies was tottering, the Czechoslovak troops wanted to go home, the Reds were hard pressing the front, which was no longer in the Urals. The Reds had already taken Novo-Nikolaievsk, they were pressing the White armies farther and farther back into Siberia, and the Siberians were tired of warfare. They did not know what would be better: to lose or to win. If they won again, the whole thing would never end. They were afraid they would not be able to hold out much longer, there were neither enough men nor enough ammunition, and the Siberians were firmly against them.

Nearer and nearer came the front, the Reds took more and more cities, more and more garrisons mutinied, and it was said that only soldiers were permitted to travel by train.

By the time the tormenting Siberian cold arrived and the invincible buran started to blow over the Siberian steppes, all further resistance was impossible and the front fell to pieces. After Christmas, they said quite openly that in only a few days more the Reds would be here, and then even those few days passed.

On an especially noisy afternoon filled with contradictory news, First Lieutenant Dima, the one who had lectured on Oriental Gods, emphatically declared that the day of action had arrived. Atchinsk, but a few miles away, had already rebelled. The brave will follow me!

And one hundred and twenty-seven worn, seedy and starving prisoners followed First Lieutenant Dima. In the city, and among the Russian soldiers, confusion reigned. But First Lieutenant Dima, with his one hundred and twenty-seven ragpickers and with four field guns, took up a position near the cemetery where the poet Géza Gyóno was buried.

The situation was grave, but Dima ridiculous. What sort of information was in his possession? What did he want with his one hundred and twenty-seven miserable, embittered, crucified prisoners of war? Whom was he waiting for near the cemetery? Whom did he want to capture? What was it all anyway?

Twilight fell and cavalrymen appeared on the hillsides. The cavalrymen were followed by Koltchak's retreating troops. Huge masses of them. The slopes of the hills were black with men. They came on horseback, afoot, on wagons.

First Lieutenant Dima fired his four field guns.

There was no chance of missing.

After a few salvoes, delegates came. There were thirty-two thousand of them. They had been fleeing the Red troops across two thousand versts. They could not go on any longer with this terrible retreat. There were children, women and civilians among them. They were ready to surrender. But the victors should beware! There were many sick among them. Half of the thirty-two thousand were typhous. They had been retreating until they could no longer stand on their feet. They could not go on, they were tired to death.

The Russian troops of the city joined Dima.

They were disarming the Koltchak troops all night long.

Half of them learned only the next day that they had surrendered to one hundred and twenty-seven men. But that made no difference. They would not have been able to go on anyway.

Koltchak's front had completely collapsed and those of the troops who could were fleeing by train, to the east.

But in the camp neither the Reds nor the Whites reigned. Neither industry nor science, nor even the arts. Neither enterprise nor capital, neither poverty nor riches. Neither friendship nor enmity, neither beauty nor ugliness, neither money nor dignity.

Typhus reigned in the camp.

The forges became cold, the bellows lost their bellies, the hammering ceased. The mixing-ladles in the shoe polish factory became dusty, all the fires went out. The fire that fed the factories as well as the one that Pélyi had lighted, the one that had sparkled from Dukesz, the one that heated the Turks, the one which Hans Kohn spread, which separated the Germans from the Czechs, which drove the men to the theater or to the roulette wheels, which spurred them on to make more money, which fried the pancakes, which kindled the agents, which blazed under the corporations, which melted the gold soles, which soldered the messtins —

The Koltchak troops had brought seventy thousand horses with them. Seventy thousand horses neighed for death on the fields. They neighed hungry and thirsty. Seventy thousand horses were dying in the six-foot snow, no one had expected them, there was nothing for them to eat. Eight thousand typhous men were dying in hospital beds by pairs and threes, beneath the hospital beds by pairs and threes, on the floors of the hospital, in the corridors, in the barracks among the healthy, in the cafés transformed into hospitals. They couldn't be cured, there was not even one pill of aspirin for them, no one had expected them.

They buried in the camp and they buried in the city. Half of the men were typhous, the other half buried. Polish lancers and Jewish cantors, Hungarian aristocrats and Russian freight-haulers, Red commanders and capitalists rolled and writhed with red spots on their bodies and breathed their last. Victors and vanquished, Reds and Whites, noblemen and orderlies, agitators and patriots. Just as, in that certain mass-grave at the end of the camp, the mass-grave of last summer, there also lay together Communists and Patriots.

The dead could not be buried in graves. The earth was frozen and they could not dig graves. They dynamited pits. The carcasses of horses competed with the human corpses. The carcasses had to be taken care of, too, because they too would bring pestilence if the spring should find them there. The dynamiting went on all day long. They blasted the mass-graves for men and horses alike, and these graves were not made for sermons and knells. These graves were protection. They did not blast them in reverence. They tried to protect themselves from pestilence, from the coming pestilence.

Comrades, victors, and vanquished were gathered in one ghastly pile. It could be done. At fifty-five below zero they were not dangerous. They would be dangerous only in the spring when they would rise in the form of pestilence.

The comrades waited, waited in the sheaves. If one's head broke off when pulled to the pile, he never met himself again. These heads had to be gathered in separate heaps. The other decent and complete corpses, freed from Wadko and industry and commands, lay silently and naked next to each other. Until they should be buried. One looked out, the other one looked in. That is to say, only if he was not so careless as to drop his head somewhere. The comrades waited in the human sheaves, waited for their abodes to last for eternity, each to harbor fifty of them.

Typhus was the master now, and it was dangerous not merely because one could die of it. It was dangerous because it heralded the pestilence of spring —

Far away from the sheaves, the clothes of the naked corpses burned. Day and night. A typhous corpse was not entitled to raiment. In the interests of the living, he was not entitled to earthly garb.

One day, he received a letter. It was from Jampel. He asked him to come if he wanted to see him once more.

He hurried to the city. Near the town, he rushed by the Jewish cemetery. A hearse stopped just then at its gate. The driver went into the caretaker's house to warm himself. He left the hearse unguarded.

A horrible curiosity drove him toward the corpses.

He lifted the black cloth with his gloved hand.

Jampel lay on the top. He lay naked in an exclusive, small company. Next to the virtuous Jampel lay a lady. She was also naked. Jampel's mouth was slightly opened, it seemed as if he had been smiling, but his chest was no longer red. It was black.

He dropped the black cloth.

Jampel would not build a house at Gércz.

He turned to go, back to the camp.

Suddenly he remembered something.

He felt very much ashamed, but then he looked around. He was all alone on the bank of the Yenisei, only the Siberian wind raced over the steppe.

At first he was ashamed, but then he hardened his heart and pulled off his glove with which he had lifted the cloth from the body of his dead comrade. He threw away the infected glove. Thus he took leave of Jampel.

CHAPTER LXXVIII

AFTER two long years, the first news from home arrived. It was not very promising. In the meantime, a new geography had been created in Europe. The mountains were still in their places, and the rivers, too, they merely belonged to other countries now.

There was no quiet as yet, although it was very encouraging to know that there was no longer war either. There was peace.

Not the kind of peace that permitted one to go home; not the kind of peace that permitted soft-cushioned trains arrive on the Yenisei. No, that kind of peace had not arrived as yet.

No, the prisoners of war were not going home as yet. No chance.

They could not go because the retreating Koltchak destroyed the tracks, they could not go because certain fronts had still to be liquidated, and they could not go because of the typhus.

The fact that the prisoner was willing to risk the typhus was no excuse. After all they knew the prisoner of war well enough to know that he would risk anything. Typhus was still raging, all the intermediate cities were still infected, all the stations were still infected, and typhus was not to be dragged into European Russia. Although, come to think of it, it was raging there, too.

The trains carried only coal. The prisoners who were willing to guard the coal shipments were permitted to go to Moscow after six weeks of service. And it was child's play to go home from Moscow —

Some of them had doubts whether they could undertake this guarding of coal shipments. The coal had to be guarded with arms, and they were afraid that, at home, this would be considered as military service. Because then there would be no sense in going home. Then it would be wiser to remain here as hostages, as Gyurka Szász did. That at least would be considered in his favor at home.

They reported in masses for the guarding of coal.

They had to guard the coal for six full weeks, it took that much time to take a trainload once from the Siberian mines to European Russia. They had to stand for six weeks in the open coal cars, with rifles in hand, and guard the treasure.

Near the larger stations, they had to guard not so much the coal as the Russian trainmen. Those were the ones who tried to steal some of it, to exchange it for all sorts of necessities. But they were armed and there were more of them than Russians, and so they could be very energetic. They guarded the coal honestly.

And after six weeks, they were faithfully taken to Moscow.

How simple and easy it was!

A little bathing, some disinfection, and the fortunates were listed and sent off to the Russian border, to Jamburg.

Who cared for those who could not pass through the sieve, for those who were left behind as hostages, who were left behind doing hard labor? Who cared for those who were left unburied at the gate of the Krasnoyarsk Jewish Cemetery, or piled up high in the middle of the camp, or in the subterranean barracks?

Who looked back at the mass-grave which, as a symbol of the annihilated camp, rose beyond the fences, who remembered the plumbers' shop, the collapsed states, the lost command, the factories, the industries? The Produce and Exchange Bank, and the actions and movements, and Ortmann's debauchery of New Year's Eve, and the sunken civilization, the nationalistic arguments and the class-wars, for which the comrades had made the supreme sacrifice —

Who looked back at the capitalists of the camp and the beggars of the camp and the civilization of the camp? A huge white blotch of lime in the place where once upon a time sheaves of corpses had lain was all that was left. And, of course, the black burnt acres in the field, and the ashes, which reminded one that what had been earthly of them had gone up into flame there —

Beyond Jamburg, on the Esthonian border, the lists and the identification papers were once more examined. His identification paper was not in order. They said it was nothing, they would immediately telephone to Jamburg to ascertain whether he was included in the official list. The Russian official went to the telephone and called Jamburg. Through the little window, he anxiously watched the train. The official was already talking with Jamburg when he suddenly heard the engine whistle, when he saw the train slowly beginning to roll out —

He dashed out of the guard-house.

Up the embankment!

He yelled that some one should stretch out a hand. Otherwise he could not reach the upper edge of the high freight car.

He held on to it and, with a last supreme effort, he climbed up.

They shot after him from the guard-house.

But he was in the car already and the train was already safely rolling among Esthonia's thousands of lakes —

The man who stretched out his hand, a private, cursed. He said he had not known what it was all about, he had stretched out his hand quite by accident. And if he had had a knife handy he would have cut his hand off —

"That's all right, brother — I am grateful to you just the same — "

"Say! You almost pulled me back into Russia — "

They were quarantined in Swinemünde. They were watched for two weeks to see whether they had not brought some Eastern epidemic with them.

In Stettin, he actually attacked the newspapers. He let himself be carried away by the long-missed excitement of news.

. . . Humanity, I have been torn away from You for seven years! How can I look up to You?

God, what are the most burning questions in the world to-day?

Permit me to raise my unworthy eyes to you, Humankind.

Of course, the flood of blood has washed away all hatred.

After the great sacrifice, the exalted voice of purified Man is ringing clearly, isn't it?

... The Alsatian question — The problem of death — The epilogue of German greatness in Alsatian politics —

That's funny!

... A joke in the weekly, Woche.

A Negro tribal chief in top hat. Is that a joke? Are these the jokes after the War?

Do you laugh at such jokes? Do your readers laugh at these jokes, Woche?

But, I just see, this tribal chief wears not only a top hat, but shoes also, and a Prince Albert coat, and socks and he seems to be well-fed and — free —

What's funny about that?

Isn't this funny too: university graduate, suspected of typhus, in turned-out, tattered artillery tunic, unshaven, his feet wrapped in rags, for seven years in lice, fighting enemy tribes, for seven years on the way, sleeping on shelves — isn't that ludicrous, too?

At the first station at home, he left the transport. He could not stand the formalities. He was lucky. He found a wagon from his home town at the station. He was going back on the road where he had started —

Haggard, pale, torn, worn.

Thus he arrived after seven years —

Here was the spot where Csutor's son had gotten on the carriage —

Here it was where they had settled that he would come home — How could they have known: this —

My God — Mother —

What if? What if —

Before they reached the village, he got off. He continued afoot.

He sent some one ahead to tell them at home that he was coming —

On the road as he passed, the peasants recognized him and clapped their hands in amazement. An old farmer would not let him go on. A peasant of his age embraced and kissed him —

Women cried about him, children hopped about, old peasants accompanied him bareheaded, as if he had come home from Beyond —

He went up the street, and, all of a sudden, he saw running toward him his gray-haired father, bare-headed, sobbing, his wife, wringing her hands, with quivering lips, with tears in her eyes, his frightened little son —

But he did not see either his mother or his brother —

Neither then, nor ever after —

... The months slowly rolled by, and one morning, as he was sitting in the garden, with quinces yellowing on the trees and barrels being repaired in the barn for the coming harvest, a queer disease suddenly attacked him —

He had never thought of that before —

Until now, he had thought of nothing but to wash away those seven years. To recover from the suffering of those seven years.

And now he felt that a weight was slowly descending upon his heart.

Of course.

It could not go on any longer like this —

He had to look after something, he had to do something.

He had to open once more his little diploma-sail against the storms that raged on the ocean of life.

He had to make a living!

There would be reproaches in the eyes to-morrow, and, all of a sudden, he was afraid of the future.

The glasses in the old cupboard would spread reproaches to-morrow, and it seemed to him that the quinces on the branches were already disapprovingly shaking their heads —

And he took leave of the grim and painful, but irresponsible past and, with heavy heart and uncertain steps, he started to go — out of the garden of unconcern....
